THE CHAIRMAN: And now, if you will listen, I will make a statement under orders of the parliamentary usage authority, Sister Benjamin, of Michigan. A certain custom originated with the first president, our sister, Mrs. Wittenmeyer, of Pennsylvania, when we were here twenty-one years ago. Mrs. Benjamin and I were talking it over, and it is thought on her suggestion that the precedent is a good one to drop at the same locality where it was taken up. I just followed the precedent of Mrs. Wittenmeyer when I became president, and I do not think that she was wrong, I think she did it the way she had seen it done, but it seems the wise heads do not do it any more, and as we are going to march along, we will march in this thing. What I want to say is to this effect, that the custom has been that when the time for the election of officers arrives, that the president has assumed her outer wrappings, and beat a retreat down the back stairs, and waited outside somewhere until they got through the election. Now, I thought that was the proper thing to do, but Mrs. Benjamin said to me: "That looks as if you went out on purpose to be re-elected."

Now, I don't think Sister Whittenmeyer had any such idea, she thought it was a matter of delicacy for the encumbent, because they might want to talk over matter and might say that they did not think she was the proper person for the place, and so on. But now, that we have the silent little ballot, I do not think that reason will hold good, and therefore, if I do not quit and go away you will know that it is because I am instructed to stop.

DR. ANNA SHAW: I hope Miss Anthony is here. She told me she was coming this morning, because for the last two years in the American National Suffrage Association, we have compelled her to go out while we elected her, and I insisted she must go out last year, because Miss Willard did, and Now Miss Anthony will be thankful that she will not have to go again.

THE CHAIRMAN: Now, when a wise body like the suffragists whom I have followed in almost all matters, of parliamentary usage, take example after us in that way, we had better be well up in all our manners, and so I am going to stay right here.

On motion, the Chair appointed the following tellers:

First Set: Caroline M. Caswell, Margaret Dickson, Martha N. Niel, Mrs. Edmonson, Mrs. R. A. Campbell, Mrs. Teats.

Second Set: Miss Belle Kearney, Clara Parrish, Miss Ensi gn, Miss Kendall, Miss Carrie Lee Carter, Mrs. Jones.

With Miss Yates, of Maine, and Miss Sara Johnson as counting tellers.

The Chair requested Mrs. Fessenden and Mrs. Meriwether to aid and support her in the new experience of being present during the election.

While the tellers were distributing the ballots on the informal vote for president, the following fraternal delegates were introdnced:

Captain Truelove, of the Salvation Army, made a stirring address and urged the women to take a more personal part in the work of suppressing the saloons. She stated that in her visits to the saloons of Cleveland she had more than once met men belonging to families with which she was acquainted who begged her not to mention seeing them in the saloons.

This earnest woman argued that the old crusade methods would prevent a great deal of the loitering about saloons which is now prevalent.

Mrs. Willing added a word on the efficiency of the work of the Salvation Army.

Mrs. Ellen Battelle Deitrick, a fraternal delegate from the National American Woman Suffrage Association was followed by Mrs. Kate Brownlee Sherwood, a fraternal delegate from the National Council of Women. This lady specially urged that the flag of our country be always kept to the fore, and that our boys and girls be brought up to strong allegiance to it and what it represents.

The noontide hour of prayer having arrived, Miss Greenwood was asked to lead in the prayer, and the hymn "Rock of Ages" was sung.

Miss Emelie J. Solomon, of South Africa, was introduced as a fraternal delegate, who stated that during the last year at their annual convention, they had voted $500 toward the support of a ward in one of the destitute homes in Cape Town, called the W. C. T. U. ward. She further said that the name of Miss Willard was as much of a household word in South Africa as in America, and the white ribbon women in South Africa were as loyal and true to her as those gathered about her on the platform.

The result of the informal ballot for President was then announced by the tellers as follows:

Total number of votes	304.
Mrs. Mary T. Burt	1.
Mrs. Caroline B. Buell	2.
Mrs. Mary H. Hunt	1.
Miss Frances E. Willard	390.

The Doxology was started by the audience.

It was then moved by Mrs. Cranmer, of South Dakota, that the secretary be instructed to cast the ballot of the convention for Miss Frances E. Willard, as President. Seconded.

The foregoing motion was put to vote by Mrs. Fessenden and Miss Willard was declared elected after the recording secretary had so cast the vote.

The hymn of "Welcome, Chieftian, Welcome" was then sung.

[Two particularly pleasant incidents that occurred here will be given in the convention number.]

It was moved by Mrs. Benjamin that the nomination be ratified and Mrs. Stevens be elected by a rising vote.

The motion was put to vote by Mrs. Fessenden and unanimously adopted.

The chairman then presented Mrs. Stevens and said:

I do not know as it is quite the thing but I always call her "Stevie."

MRS. STEVENS: Listening to the all too kind and too generous words of our president, I was reminded of a day twenty years ago when in the pine grove at Old Orchard, Maine, I heard for the first time Miss Willard's voice as she told the story of humanity's need and woman's duty and privilege. I recall this moment the sacred vow I that day made that I would do what I could to help the work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and I tried although I have often mourned that I could not do more, that I could not do better and yet I have said I would rather be a doorkeeper for the W. C. T. U., than to be a queen outside of its ranks. I thank you, dear chieftain, for this expression of your confidence, and I pray that I may be worthy of such a trust. I thank you, beloved co-workers, for the kindly way in which you have endorsed the nomination of your president and, however light or however heavy the duties of this new office may prove to be, I will pray, and I ask you to prayer too for me that I may fill it acceptably and faithfully, seeking continually to be guided by the great spirit of rignt, of truth, of love.

The report of the tellers on the informal ballot for corresponding secretary was then read as follows:

Total, 390; Miss Lodie Read, 1; Miss Lois Russell, 1; Mrs. Rice, 1; Mrs. Frences W. Graham, 1; Mrs. E. Burgess, 1; Mrs. Mead, 1; Mrs. Benjamin, 2; Mrs. Hoffman, 3; Mrs. Bullock, 7; Mrs. Stevens, 9; Mrs. Rounds, 16; Mrs. Bool, 22; Mrs. C. Buell, 39; Mrs. Katharine Lente Stevenson, 286.

It was moved by Mrs. Dunham that the secretary be instructed to cast the ballot of the convention for Mrs. Stevenson for corresponding secretary.

The motion was carried, Mrs. Stevenson was declared elected and the chair appointed Mrs. Grow as a committee of one to conduct her to the platform.

MRS. STEVENSON: I hope you do not expect a speech of me because that is something that I cannot do. Ever since our dear sister Woodbridge left us I have been wondering down in my little office at the other end of the hall, how I could bear to see any other woman in her place, and I am not any more reconciled to myself there than I would be any one else. The feeling that I have this morning is just this,—who is sufficient for this thing? If it were not that I feel as if God had brought this about, I would not bear to stand before you here. I realize all that it means to attempt to take the place of that woman whom I loved and honored, filled so wonderfully last year. You will not expect of me, I am sure that I fill her place, but I know you will support me by your prayers, and by your sympathy that I may be enabled to carry out to the best of my ability what she would have wished and done had she been here. The one thing that has been in my mind since I started from that seat down there was,—I wonder if she is pleased, I wonder if she is. I shall try to do all that I can to carry out what I knew of her great thought, and I surely need not tell you that it is the honor of my life to be associated with this wonderful band of women and to take the place in a measure of Mary A Woodbridge.

Song, "Blest Be the Tie that Binds."

The Chairman then introduced Miss Wells, fraternal delegate from the African Methodist Church, who stated that she brought greetings from the mite missionary society of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, a society which endeavored to do for the home life of the colored women what the National W. C. T. U. is endeavoring to do for the home life of women in general, and asked the assistance of the women in this convention for the suppression of lawlessness towards their race.

The ballots for recording secretary were collected and the ballot declared closed. While the ballots were being counted Mrs. Barker announced that something over $300 was collected in the Sunday evening collections.

Telegrams of love and greetings to be sent to Mrs. Mary A. Livermore, and Mrs. Josephine Nicolls, were read.

Mrs. M. A. Davis, of Delaware, O., exhibited a crazy quilt, and explained that when finished it was to be presented to Mrs. Carse, as a token of appreciation of her labors in behalf of the Temple, and she asked for pieces, material, to put into the quilt. The name of the donor to be painted on it for one dollar and embroidery put upon it for fifty cents.

The tellers reported the result on the informal ballot for recording secretary to be as follows:

Total number of votes, 389; Scattering, 12; Mrs. Vie H. Campbell, 3; Mrs. Mary T. Burt, 4; Mrs. J. M. Gradner, 4; Mrs. L. S. Rounds, 7; Mrs. E. Boole, 11; Mrs. Caroline B. Buell, 11; Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, 107; Mrs. Clara C. Hoffman, 230.

On motion of Mrs. Campbell, the secretary was directed to cast the ballot of the Convention for Mrs. Clara C. Hoffman as recording secretary of the National W. C. T. U., which was done, and Mrs. Clara C. Hoffman declared the duly elected recording secretary of the National W. C. T. U.

MRS. HOFFMAN: Madam President and dear sisters of the W. C. T. U. I thank you for this large vote in compliment to my voice. I don't want to be recording secretary; I have had a taste of it one year, and I never want to touch it again with the end of my little finger. No one needs to know what purgatory means after she has been recording secretary of the National W. C. T. U. for one year, for she knows, she has had experience. I was very glad to-day that after fourteen years of service, such as Mrs. Stevens, my comrade, has given, that you did have the grace and the courtesy and the appreciation to give her a hearty endorsement as you did to-day. If, in the opinion of this Convention, I have earned this honor, certainly she has earned it, and I speak from a point where I understand it particularly. I have not slept, nor ate, nor washed my hands since I commenced to be recording secretary, because I haven't had time. Now, dear sisters, I have not accepted this office yet, and I would not accept it for ten thousand dollars unless you will have a stenographer on this platform that shall take every word that is given and then shall typewrite it out and let me pick out what is necessary. Another thing, another reason why I don't want this office. There is no position in this convention more honorable nor more desirable than to stand at the head of your delegation, and it breaks my heart to be away from my women. They are just as loyal and true as they can be and I want to be with them. They do everything that they can to show me that they appreciate me. They load me with flowers, because you know they are becoming to me. I will accept this office on this condition that I name. Again and again, since I came into this work, I have said to Mrs. Stevens, "Why, Steve, I wouldn't do this work for any organization on the face of the earth, and I wouldn't." Now, you have heard it. Now, dear sisters, I accept this with the provision and only if I can be relieved from the drudgery all day and all night of recording secretary.

On motion of Mrs. Reeve it was moved that these requisites be accorded our recording secretary.

THE CHAIRMAN: The vote is an overwhelming endorsement of the eloquent address to which we have listened, that woman is a tremendously convincing thing.

MRS. HOFFMAN: I have accepted. Now, they say behind me, "nominate your assistant," and I desire to stand for the south. I want all parts of our country represented, as far as we can bring it about, and I desire to nominate for my assistant recording secretary Mrs. Frances E. Beauchamp, of Kentucky.

THE CHAIRMAN: There has never been anybody from the South represented among our general officers. They have seen and been silent, these women from the South, in the presence of some matters that perhaps would hurt some of the rest of us if we had been brought up as they are.

On motion of Mrs. Benjamin the nomination of Mrs. Beauchamp was unanimously ratified, and the recording secrelary directed to cast the ballot of the association for Mrs. Beauchamp, which was done, and Mrs. Frances E. Beauchamp, of Kentucky, was declared the duly elected assistant recording secretary.

MRS. BEAUCHAMP: I don't think any woman was ever more surprised than I have been by this action. I thank you from the bottom of my heart for the confidence you repose in me, and I thank our recording secretary for choosing me, and I shall do my best to serve you, not as a Southern woman only, but as a woman from our country, knowing we are all one, recognizing no North, no South, no East, no West, but universal sisterhood in Christ Jesus.

The tellers being now ready to report on the informal ballot for treasurer, were called upon and reported as follows:

Total number of votes cast, 382. Scattering, 5; Mrs. Boole, 2; Clara Hoffman, 4; Miss Esther Pugh, 9; Helen M. Barker, 363.

On motion of Mrs. Kinney the secretary was instructed to cast the ballot of the association for Mrs. Barker, which was done, and Mrs. Helen M. Barker declared duly elected treasurer of the National W. C. T. U.

THE CHAIRMAN: Mrs. Barker, you have earned that wonderful compliment, if there ever a woman did, Nothing succeeds like success.

MRS. BARKER: Madam president, ladies of the convention: I thank you for this token of your esteem, and believe that I shall be able to serve yon better the coming year than I did the last. You elected me in absence and when I did not want it, and I have done the best I could, but if I come to you, and come to you, and ask for money, you must take it in good part and believe that that is my business. I congratulate the Convention that whatever disadvantages we may have with the recording secretary we have a clean-handed treasurer, or I have washed my hands within five minutes!

After singing, "It's Coming," and the benediction by Miss Cassie Smith the convention adjourned to meet at 2 o'clock.

Ah, comrades! We stand in the silence,
Homesick for a day.
But how can our anguish be bitter?
We follow that way.
Let us lift up our hearts, oh, beloved;
Love on, as of yore;
Who knows but in stress of the battle
She hastes to the fore?
Then "onward, ye brave," to the duty;
Not far, with the King in his beauty
We greet her once more.

OUR Indiana leaders have crystalized their approval of the plan for organization among young women in colleges into practicability by appropriating one hundred dollars to assist the National Secretary, Mrs. Barnes and the State Y Secretary, Miss Dickson, in that work in Indiana the coming year.

THE relative importance of our national department, a question that has never been decided, must now hinge upon the support accorded to Mrs. Benjamin's claim that Parliamentary Usage is the basic department, without which none other could exist!

A BEAUTIFUL token and one which touched and made happy the loyal Michigan delegation came from their absent but present in the spirit leader. It was a large bow of broad white ribbon, the ends of which were lettered as follows: "Michigan Delegates, 1894," and on the other, "Mizpah, Mary T. Lathrap."

THE question of re-submitting the prohibitory law comes again before the South Dakota Convention this winter. Mrs. Cranmer, State W. C. T. U. president and Mrs. Anna R. Simmons, vice-president, will go again to the field of battle as they did two years ago, and we trust that victory will again be ours as it was then.

REV. FRANCES TOWNSLEY led the last of the morning prayer meetings at the Convention church this morning. Her theme was from John, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink." Many testimonies were given regarding work among fallen girls. Two-minute prayers were offered for the lost in all classes.

INTERESTING meetings have been held each day during the Convention in parlor 141, Hollenden, by the workers in the Railway Department, Mrs. C. M. Woodward, Supt. Miss Augusta Stiles, of Southbury, Conn., presented the superintendent of her state with $10 for literature. Mesdames Flauser, of India, and Hancock, of Burmah, have aided the foreign work.

THE National Superintendents remain in service for the coming year, with only a few exceptions. Mrs. Stella Irvine becomes the head of Sunday school work in place of Mrs. Bidwell, resigned. The vacancies in the departments of Temperance Literature, Unfermented Wine, and Flower Mission are referred to the General Officers who will act upon the names suggested.

I KNOW missionaries tell us they have gone through the Orient and found no unfermented wine. I have also known that travelers have gone through the Orient and found no Christians—They wern't looking for that kind. I know that Christian scholarship is against us, but I am also comforted by the fact that Christian scholarship sanctioned African slavery—until it was given up. —Dr. Bashford.

NATIONAL WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.

TWENTY-FIRST ANNUAL CONVENTION.

TUESDAY AFTERNOON.

The convention was called to order by Mrs. S. S. Fessenden.

Mrs. Narcissa White Kinney, president of Oregon led in prayer.

In the absence of the secretary, consent was given that the reports of organizers be next heard.

Miss Willard in the chair.

THE CHAIRMAN: Alice Stone Blackwell is here, and I know that she comes forward to give a word of greeting, and I dare say of exhortation, she who is the secretary of our franchise department, which was not represented; you will think of that honored and revered woman, her mother. I will asked her to come forward.

MISS BLACKWELL: My friends, I am sorry not to be able to give the excellent report of my superior officer, your national superintendent of franchise. We have had reports from 33 states and territories, seven have not reported and eight are still without this department. Especially good work has been done in four states, New York, Illinois, Kansas and Colorado. You all know about the great petition in New York. In Illinois 30,000 women in Chicago registered to vote for a trustee of the state university. In Kansas a woman's suffrage amendment has just been defeated by one of those defeats which are a victory. When an amendment was submitted in 1867 it received only 10,000 votes in the whole state. This year it was again submitted, and it came so near passing that a change of 2,000 votes would have carried it, and in Colorado where women have full suffrage they cast more than half the entire vote, and elected three women to the legislature. Now, the only drawback to all this good news is that people will say "Oh, woman's suffrage is coming, it is certainly coming," and then they sit back and do not think about lending a hand. Dr. Parkhurst has said, "The wicked flee when no man pursueth, but they make better time when there is somebody after them." And woman's suffrage is certainly coming, but it will come sooner if you will all take hold and help.

REPORTS OF ORGANIZERS.

MRS. HENRIETTA SKELTON:

Organization is the great wheel in our work. Without unions organized there would be no revenue to carry on the work, there could not be any conventions, there could not be any superintendents; there would not be any delegates here. So I consider our work the first, the greatest, the most important one. I organized in the last year 20 new unions; 16 in California, three in Nevada, one in the Black Hills. I travelled 6,000 miles by rail, 93 by stage and by water. Attended seven county conventions.

Organized 11 L. T. L's; three Sunday schools; sent in 14 new subscribers to THE UNION SIGNAL. Our temperance congress was a great success. Our franchise has received a new life. Great care should be exercised in organizing a union. Many a union dies because it never was started right. The leader or president should be a woman of zeal and of love, who has power in her to hold the union; who will master every detail in our work so as to clinch others; the recording secretary should be a Mrs. Doublequick; the corresponding secretary a Mrs. Wideawake; the treasurer a Mrs Push.

I organized in the last year 48 new unions; organized in new counties where we had not a single member. I went into the very farthest of our counties in Cal Del Norte, where I had the pleasure of traveling by the sea 700 miles, by stage 90 miles and on horse back 50 miles. We held the convention ere I left them, and now they circulate petitions for a no-license campaign.

Our franchise superintendent wrote up the "Doings of our last legislature," and we have presented it three times to evening audiences, netting us for state work each time $100. I recommend it to unions as the best means to make a little money.

MRS. DELLE H. COX, organizer: Dear soldiers of the White Ribbon Army: With God's blessing I have been able to be almost steadily in the field since January 1, 1894. I took no vacation during the long, hot months, but spoke day and night in the burning sands of the Snake River Valley with the thermometer ranging and raging from 100 to 117 in the shade. As I looked about on the awful desolation the drink curse has made and continues still to make in this new country, I said, "If God gives me life and strength I will take no vacation for either heat or cold until the saloon-keeper does."

In looking over my account for the year I find I have spoken as follows: In West Washington, including all the cities on the sound, ninety-seven public lectures; twenty-one meetings with the women. Also attended the county conventions of Olympia and Vancouver, also the state convention of the Temperance Alliance at Seattle, spoke for the sailors at Port Townsend, the soldiers at Vancouver and in the mission at Tacoma, organized seven W's and one Y, received two hundred and eighty-four voting and two hundred and twelve honorary members.

In Oregon gave twenty-four lectures and sermons, and seven method meetings, attended three county conventions and the prohibition state convention at Salem.

In East Washington gave twenty-seven public addresses and held twenty-five mothers' and methods meetings with the ladies; organized nine unions, and received two hundred voting, and eighty-six honorary members; attended three county conventions, organized two counties and attended the state convention at Dayton.

SUMMARY.

W. C. T. U's. organized, 16; Y. W. C. T. U's., 1; letters and cards written, 1004; literature distributed, 32730 pages; miles traveled, on the railroad, more than 8,000.

I have also traveled by boat for almost three months over the Sound, and by stage, meeting appointment after appointment.

I want to say to you that you ought to realize that among all those making reports here the national organizers have to be the smartest women of them all, and I will tell you why. Our national superintendents are expected to be efficient in some particular line of work. National organizers must know how to talk to a school of method, must understand parliamentary usage, must be able to hold mothers' meetings and be full of information of all sorts covering every single line of department work, must know how to proceed in a cool and beautiful manner at any place, convention or meeting to which she may be called suddenly, and so I think it goes without saying that in order to be able to do all these things she must certainly be one of the wisest and smartest of them all.

A MEMBER: Where did you get the money?

MRS. COX: I never have received one penny from the National W. C. T. U. I have made my expenses as I went along through this work. I haven't any salary back of me.

MISS FRANCES GRIFFIN: I am one of those organizers the last speaker talked about as knowing everything after the very best methods. I had a good report when I came, it sounded beautifully when I read it off to myself one day. Since I have been here the last twenty-four hours I have heard said, over and over again, those very pretty things that I had prepared for you and thought they were perfectly original. It is very difficult to be original all to yourself and when you get together, you find we are all thinking a good deal alike. I have a long list of how many unions I have organized, how many hundred miles I have traveled, how many nights I have spent. Oh, it is big arithmetic, but I know you don't want to hear it, and I am not going to inflict it. I was delayed the first of the meeting and I am very sorry because I wanted to be here to give a little bit of advice. Advice is the cheapest thing any of us ever give, and we give it very freely. I want to tell you when I read in the DAILY SIGNAL that you were undertaking to meddle with the United States navy and were uneasy about that bottle that Mrs. Cleveland broke over the ship's head, it didn't disturb me a bit, I wouldn't have cared if she had broken every bottle in the United States, but coming from this section I know what it is to undertake a contest with the United States navy. It is sufficient for me to say that at all times we have met the enemy and they are ours, that is, you know which are yours and I know which are mine. That is all I have got to say. I have been at work whenever I could get a chance and I have worked as long as that chance lasted and then I went home and waited for another call, and I think that I am going to do that same thing another year if you will give me more chance and therefore more work. I want to speak to you candidly because we enjoy saying things that are very candid and sound a little strange to us once in a while. I have not organized a great deal because I have been careful to go along to speak where the organizations were already in good order, so that I might have a living as I went along. Whenever you put everything behind me so that I can venture going into a town where I don't see the chance of getting my breakfast unless there is something behind me, I will organize in that town, but until you do, I am going to wait till these more adventurous spirits who know how to perform a little sleight of hand and have means to work on will organize a meeting, then I will go in and tell them to brace up.

THE CHAIRMAN: The next in order is the presentation of fraternal delegates, and everyone whose name is on the list has been presented, except the biggest one of them, and I wanted to bring her forward as soon as she came to the platform, but she said she wanted to look around a little and see how we performed, and so I expect she thinks we do very much as we like. I want to introduce to you Miss Susan B. Anthony.

MISS ANTHONY: For one thing, I think this is a pretty nice little girl, and I am glad you have your dear leader brought back to you from the old world, and rejoice with you in every direction, and I am glad that of all the rest of you it seems that each and every one from every state who has come up here have run your head against the ballot box. That is the delight of my life, because the majority of women never get there, never see the relation between the things they wish to be done and the ballot until they have failed to obtain what they wish, and have been defeated, and after such experience woman after woman and class after class of women are brought into the fold of suffrage, and I am glad, as the representative of the National American Woman's Suffrage Association, to be introduced to this magnificent—not an audience of spectators only, but an audience from all the States of the Union, and I am more glad than I can tell you that when your President introduced me to you you all felt glad and rejoiced in the fact that your President has done so. The time was, and I love to tell you all of it, and it is only twelve years ago, when your President introduced me to a great national convention, the only one which I have ever entered until this one, in the City of Washington, and it was almost at the cost of her official head that she had the temerity to introduce one of the heads of the suffrage movement. Now, you have grown greatly and you all agree with us and you all see with us, and you all see that the ballot is the great need, the great power which you need to back and sustain all of your prayers and all of your songs and all of your works in every possible direction, and in your arrival at this station point, at the end of twenty-one years—it is time you arrived there; every boy when he gets there knows enough that he wants to vote and of course, women that have wrought and wrought with such fearful pains and self-sacrifice, I am glad that all on arriving at twenty-one agree that at the next great demand is the ballot. And I want to say to you as I stand here, if all the herculean work done by the women of this great association in the last twenty-one years had been done by a class of human beings holding this power of the ballot in their hands, you would have gained everything demanded and the whole world would have been revolutionized. The only reason you have not gained it, is because you have not in your hands the power to make this a great balance of power between the political parties to compel them to do the things which you demand. So I pray you to go on and learn to love the ballot more and more.

THE CHAIRMAN: In honor of Miss Anthony and in token of the unanimous appreciation of her exhortation, let us sing, "Press on, Press on."

After the song the chairman stated that she would present all those whose names were given her by the committee on courtesy with their names and titles.

The first presented was Senator James M. Williams, author of the bill giving married women the right to hold their own property.

SENATOR WILLIAMS: Whenever there comes a demand for anything I think there is always a way provided to attain it. Several years ago Ohio like the greater portion of the rest of our States was exceedingly unfair to women especially in her property relations and property rights. The common law originally as pertaining to property in this state classified women with idiots and lunatics and imbeciles from the fact that no matter how much property she might possess or control that it was wholly and entirely vested in her husband. It was so unfair that every acre of land which she might own during her married life, the right to its use and its rents and its issues and its profits was vested entirely in her husband, no matter from what source it may have been derived, no matter how capable she may have been of exercising control over it and managing it. When my attention was drawn to this state of things it seemed to me it was manifestly unfair. We were two thousand years behind the times; even pagan Rome that had no God and no Christ was way ahead of the enlightened nineteenth century with its Christianity and all its attending influences. A man might after his wife had died under these laws of which I have spoken, marry again, raise a second family and support them from the profits of his first wife's property and turn his first wife's children out of doors and they had no recourse during the lifetime of their father. The law said that she was incompetent to manage her affairs, that there was something about her association with her husband that rendered her incompetent. Well, I felt a little sensitive about that. I thought a few years ago it would be a wise thing to get married and I found it was and my experience in that respect taught me that a married woman was just as intelligent and I thought a little more so, after she became married than before. So it occurred to me as a much simpler way that she should be clothed with the same power after marriage in regard to the control of her individual property as that which a married man possessed.

Hon. William T. Clark, author of the Clark School Suffrage Bill, was presented, and said that he believed not only in women voting but in their being voted for, and exhorted all women to exercise the prerogative of voting for school offices as far as it had been given them.

Col. Nate Read, fraternal delegate of the Keeley League and editor of their organ, the Banner of Gold, was introduced.

Rev. William G. Hubbard, of Columbus, Ohio, President of Peace Association of the Friends of America, and Secretary of the American Railway Literary Union, for suppressing impure literature, also lecturer on Prohibition, was presented and said that he brought greetings from an hundred thousand peaceful Quakers and said that he felt quite at home in this convention, as the W. C. T. U. had taken up three of the lines of work in which he was interested, and added that he had been lecturing on these subjects for more than twenty-five years. As secretary of the American Railway Literary Union, he had, within the past two years, traveled thirty thousand miles and had cleared fifty thousand miles of railway of the worst books found upon them. He also stated that he brought greeting from the Peace Association and bade the W. C. T. U. God-speed in their work of destroying those twin devils born in hell, War and Intemperance.

Mrs. Cora B. Taylor, fraternal delegate from the International Supreme Lodge of Good Templars, was introduced and greeted the convention.

IN MEMORIAM, MARY A. WOODBRIDGE.

In charge of Mrs. Helen M. Bullock.

MISS WILLARD: It almost seems as if I can hear Mary's voice when I read these lines, at the head of the pages of our program. Her relatives are here. I am going to ask Mrs. Hoffman to read the verse at the top of the page showing to-day's program. I think it was put on the program after Mary went away, that sweet verse of Mary Lathrap's.

MRS. HOFFMAN: The program was not changed, excepting these words at the top, and where we now have "In Memoriam." Mrs. Woodbridge had arranged it as a Jubilate Service.

A solo by Mrs. Harris, "Beyond the Smiling and the Weeping."

MRS. BULLOCK: I believe it would have been the wish of any one of those in whose memory this service is held that our beloved national president should offer the prayer, and I have asked her to do so.

Miss Willard offered a most tender and touching prayer, closing with these words: "We know that the tender, great heart of her who is not with us is thinking and noting the hour, she whose eloquent voice has so often winsomely lifted us up unto Thine Heaven. We fear that we may not hear it on this side again, but we bless Thee for the faith her childhood knew, the faith that has been her bright reward in all these laborious years. God bless our Mary Lathrap here among us still and our Mary Woodbridge, who so sweetly and painlessly passed to the better country and bring us along tenderly in Thine own good time and way, give us a peaceful hour if it please Thee in which to die and bring us to this holy union with those whom we have loved and lost through the riches of grace in Christ Jesus. Amen."

After the reading of several selections of Scripture, the Chairman, Mrs. Bullock, said: It had been our glad thought, dear friends, to come up in this, our twenty-first annual meeting, and hold a jubilate instead of a memorial service, but strange and mysterious are our lives and truly we may never know what a day may bring forth. As the years go by and one by one our white ribboners go to their reward, we realize our personal loss and the great loss to our cause, we feel that we cannot do without them. It brings deep sorrow to us when a faithful soldier falls by the way, for the battle grows fiercer and we do so need them. But I believe we are thus led that we may place our faith more strongly in our Heavenly Leader and less in earthly instrumentalities. We cannot always see why these things are, but that seems to me to be it. We know that our God is able to deliver us, although our beloved comrades may rest from their labors. We know their works will follow them and we shall shortly see the fruits thereof. I believe, dear friends, that this work to which God has called us will better fit us for our heavenly home. Our workers often say that the work is doing more for them than they can do for it, and I believe that their superior development verifies the words of a great writer, who said, in describing the soul, "the soul is a vast capacity for God. It is like a curious chamber added on to being, a chamber with elastic and contracting walls, which with God as its guest expands illimitably, but which without Him shrinks and shrivels until every vestige of the divine is gone and what is left could not be called a soul, it is only a shrunken, useless organ, sentenced to death by inactivity," and so, dear friends, disuse always means death, whether it is in the natural, in the intellectual, the moral or the spiritual world, and I believe our dear ones that have labored with us here are better prepared for their reward and for the "well done" than they would have been, had they not been privileged to work for humanity here, for all work for humanity is work for Christ and must bring us nearer to Him.

When we met in Chicago last year, our cry went up to God for the life and help of our dear national president, and God heard our prayer and brought her back to us and she is here to-day to cheer and encourage us, and to mingle her tears with ours in this our great sorrow. During the year we have been very anxious in regard to many of our state presidents. Some of them have been almost within sight of the pearly gates. When your speaker was asked to conduct this memorial service, our Mary Woodbridge wrote, "No names have yet been sent in, but doubtless there will be before November, as there always are." Later on she wrote again and said, "We are rejoicing that not an officer in our National organization or an organizer, or a superintendent has been taken from us this year, and therefore we have resolved to have a jubilate service instead of a memorial." But, oh dear friends, what was the next that I heard? You see the vacant chair. She was the first to lay down her work and go away. I shall never forget her kind and encouraging words to me when I first came into this work and was a stranger to nearly all of you. I shall never cease to thank God for her sympathy and her helpfulness all the way along, and now, dear friends, if she was so much to me who had known her for these few years, how much more must she be to those of you who have known her longer and more intimately, whose privilege it has been to be with her in all these years of her work. And so I am going to ask her own state president, Mrs. Henrietta Monroe, to say a few words to you in regard to her life and her work.

MRS. MONROE: Mary A. Woodbridge was a woman admired, honored and loved, so that to-day her memory is enshrined in the heart of every Ohio woman. She was one of Ohio's most gifted women. She was the brilliant president of the Ohio Union for five years; she was the peerless leader of the second amendment campaign, sitting here in the city of Cleveland, speaking words which vibrated throughout this whole state. She was the faithful recording secretary of the National W. C. T. U. for fifteen years; last year she was promoted to the second place in the coterie of the general officers, but there was higher promotion for her before her year of service had closed.

We were to have welcomed her to this city by the lake, but she has been welcomed to the heavenly city, the city by the golden sea, whose pearly gates opened wide to receive her. We were to have welcomed her with words of love but she has heard the welcome plaudit, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of the Lord." Blossoms, these beautiful flowers, which she loved so well, were to have breathed a welcome to her, but to-day she walks in green pastures and by still waters in the land of immortal bloom where leaf fades not and the flower never withers. She was to be welcomed by the voice of song, but hark! ten thousand harps and voices have welcomed her to her heavenly home. She was to have been welcomed to this beautiful house and to this great audience, but she has been welcomed into mansions above, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens, and her company is to-day an innumerable company of angels, which no man can number, and she is beholding the glories which our eyes have not seen nor our ears heard, nor hath it entered into our hearts to conceive the blessedness which awaits her.

There is one less here; the charmed circle has been broken, the dear face that we have missed from its accustomed place is saved and cleansed and purified by grace. There is one more in heaven. To her our voice of welcome is hushed and to her the farewell word is forever spoken.

THE CHAIRMAN: Although no officer in our ranks has fallen this year, many of the faithful ones have gone home. I shall mention but a few, because the list is so very large. Mrs. Rhoda A. Esmond, of Syracuse, is one of the five who signed the call for the convention to appoint delegates to the first national convention to be held in this city; Mrs. L. E. Trott, Mt. Vernon, N. Y.; Mrs. M. L. Berry, Treasurer of the W. C. T. U., of Kansas; Miss Addie Sherman, Associate Evangelist of Railroad Work. The funeral of Miss Sherman was attended by a large number of railroad employes and passes provided over the railroad to all wishing to attend. The mother of Mrs. Hannah Bailey asked that the white ribbon be placed upon her breast. The daughter of our Lucy Washington, and our dear friend, the Rev. Dr. Herrick, and there are many others whose names I will not mention; in my own state over three hundred have been called from active duty.

Mrs. Stevens read the following on behalf of Mr. Woodbridge:

While my lips refuse to speak my heart urges me to tender a word of heartfelt thanks to the dear sisters of the W. C. T. U. who have so kindly by word and deed emphasized their affection for my wife, dear beloved Mary. Their tender sympathy for her family comes to us all as a silver living to the dark cloud overshadowing our now desolate home. I wish to express my undying interest in the cause Mary loved so well and served so faithfully and I am ever your bereaved and trusting brother.

A touching solo was sung by Mrs. Graham of New York, "Only Remembered by What I have done."

The memorial exercises were closed with a benediction by Rev. Anna Shaw.

While many of the audience were leaving, "Rock of Ages" was sung at the suggestion of the President.

After announcements were made, the Doxology was sung and the meeting adjourned after a benediction by Miss Ackermann.

TUESDAY EVENING.

The meeting was called to order by Mrs. Anna M. Hammer, president of the Pennsylvania W. C. T. U.

The opening exercises consisted of the singing of "Coronation," and prayer by Mrs. Emily L. McLaughlin, of Boston.

Mrs. Harris sang the song "Old Oaken Bucket," the audience joining in the chorus.

Mrs. L. S. Rounds, of Illinois, was then introduced.

MRS. ROUNDS: The theme before us tonight is the "Development of the Crusade Idea." I am not certain that the crusaders had any ideas about this matter. There fell upon them a sudden inspiration from God, as I believe, to go out upon the streets and into the saloons to pray, to see if by any possible means they could persuade the saloonkeeper to be decent. I think that is about the sum total of their thought, rounded out possibly with this hope, that they might by so doing free the home from the curse of strong drink. But I am positive that to the clearest mind of them all there never dawned the thought that the movement would grow to what it has become. If any one of them could have looked down the years and have seen by any vision such a magnificent sight as this convention has been, I am sure they would have been astonished beyond the power of expression. We have come on through the years, and tonight we stand as you have heard it often said during this convention, at our twenty-first birthday and we are looking out into the future with large hope and great expectations, and I cannot tonight do better in the few minutes I shall talk, than to speak a little along the development, perhaps not so much of the crusade idea as some of the ideas that have come to some of us since we entered into this work.

I said to a gentleman who asked me this question not long ago upon a train: "What in your judgment is the most pathetic feature of the temperance work to-day?" Well, I thought a moment and I saw that long procession of drunkards' wives, broken-hearted women weary and discouraged, I thought of them as yesterday in the freshness of their girlhood with all the hopes of the future gathered about them they gave their hands in loving trustfulness into the keeping of those who promised to love and to protect them, promises unbroken by some but broken by many hundreds and thousands, and there they are to-day a long, weary, broken-hearted set of women. A drunkard's wife is in my thought a woman to be pitied for when you have taken the courage out of a woman's heart you have taken all there is of her. And I almost made answer to this friend that was the most pathetic feature of the temperance question.

And then I caught my voice and caught my words and said, "No, not that, there is a longer procession still of the little children here that did not ask to come, born of broken parents, their future mortgaged to the rum power, pale-faced, weary, wan little ones." Now, we have said it again and again that every child has the right to be well born, but a child born of drunken parents is not well born. So as I thought of the longer procession still of the wronged childhood of this nation, I said, "That is the most pathetic feature," and then I caught my breath again and caught my words and said, "No, that is not the most pathetic feature," and then my friend looked into my face with wondering eyes, and said, "Well, what then?" I made answer in these words: "The most pathetic feature in my judgment to-day of this great question that is before us is the stultified conscience of American voters." Why do I say that? Because the legalized saloon which is the curse of this land is the direct result of the expression at the ballot box which when crystallized into law protects this ungodly business.

While I am a woman suffragist I am not radical enough, sisters, to say that we will gain anything by adding the ignorant and vicious vote of women, so I would like to have a clear cut and strong educational basis on the suffrage question, and I would like to have brought to that line the men and the women who are counted off to serve our country along the lines of citizenship.

Then, as another remedy I would close the gates of this Republic of ours, against any more foreign pauper immigration. I believe that it is time that we had a chance to digest what we have already swallowed. Whether these shall ever fully assimilate is a problem of the future. Lord Macaulay uttered no more profound truth than when he said that no nation can long survive which permits its vicious classes to make its laws. We are proving that statement in every single political campaign that this country sees. We have already entered upon one that will deluge this land in a few months with such kind of talk and such kind of campaign effort that make every true-hearted American patriot blush for his land. In the great city, which is my home, seven thousand saloons dictate the policy of the city, control its municipal laws and hold the reigns of government, and you cannot elect a Christian man to any office.

We may establish soup houses every winter in our lives in our great cities. We may solicit subscriptions from the wealthy; we may have our philanthropic clubs, and we may set in motion all the machinery of our best brains and hearts, but the labor will be lost if we confine our work simply to feeding and clothing the poor masses, and do not shut up the infernal saloon.

I long ago parted company with sentiment, and I believe in strikes, and the strike that I believe in is the strike that hits the liquor traffic between the eyes and strikes to kill, and while the liquor traffic is a very impersonal thing, I believe that when we deal with it, as we shall deal with it sometime, we will deal with the men behind it, and we will see to it that their bloody hands are taken off from our governmental forces. All hail the day, I will help to bring it on

Mrs. Barker stated that envelopes had been distributed among the seats, and asked that the audience and members of the convention place in each a penny for each year of their age as a contribution towards the fund for the colored people of the south.

Mrs. Harris sang a solo, by special request, "If I Were a Voice."

Miss Elizabeth Yates, lecturer of the department of franchise of the National W. C. T. U., was introduced and said:

MISS YATES: There is a fashion in ideas as there is in dress, and opinions of people are continually changing. With our growing impetuosity we Americans adopt the last fad, whether balloon sleeves or football, Ibsen or Columbus. But we have not only fashions of thought that come and go and leave not a taste behind, but we have fashions in thought that determine human destiny and individual responsibility and the progress of the race. There was a time when the king sat upon his throne and the people thought he had a divine right to rule. The lord cracked the lash and his slave cowered, the noble struck the spear and the serf bowed knee. To-day that fashion of thought is passing away. We remember that it was once thought that only the elect, the favored few were to be educated.

But in the first change of fashion of thought that gave education to all, as you read colonial history you will see that girls were not youth then any more than women are people to-day and as late as in 1787 in Hatfield, Mass., a father who had daughters and no sons, asked in the town meeting that girls might be permitted to occupy the vacant seats in the school room at which an irate citizen arose and said, "What, Hatfield schools used for teaching shes? Never." But the Hatfield schools have been opened for the girls, and to-day from the primary to the university they have educational opportunities, and in many instances the shes are bearing off the prizes from the hes.

It was once the fashion of thought that women were the great talkers of the world, and whenever in Puck and Judge the mother-in-law jokes gave out, they could always fill in the empty space by jokes about a woman's tongue. But since the last extra session of congress, the fashion of thought in regard to who are the great talkers of the world, is decidedly changed. When the men gathered there in Weshington and talked and talked as only men can talk, all day and night, not one-hour speeches, but five and ten and fifteen-hour speeches, they beat the record of all the sewing societies and women's conventions that ever assembled. And the people grew weary and said, "How shall we down brakes on the tongues of the senators?" And the press cried out, "Danger through the land is stalking, will you never cease your talking?"

But like Poe's raven on the chamber door, came back the answer, "Never more," and they never did stop until from exhaustion, and to-day the revised version of Shakespeare reads, "Silence, thy name is woman."

The fashion of thought in regard to closing the saloon has wonderfully changed during the past twenty-one years. Twenty-one years ago the mothers and sisters that had borne the burdens of sorrows so long went from the hearthstone and cradle down the street and composed a song, "Give to the Winds Thy Fears, Hope and be Undismayed."

Into the saloons they went and mother laid her Bible where her boy took his first glass, and as the rumseller listened to the word of God he trembled, and trembling, repented. But that kind of endeavor could not be permanent. The enthusiasm wore away. The women went back to the cradle and the kitchen, the rumsellers that had repented dropped back, forgot their new purposes and opened the saloons again. The women came at last to recognize that there was something else needed, and so they drew up this organization. We have advanced a long way. We have come to where we realize that even when you have a prohibitory law you have simply a weapon that may become entirely useless. A prohibitory law is worth no more than the paper it is written upon unless backed by officers to see to its enforcement. Men in local option campaigns vote prohibition and then think they can go home and sit and sing themselves away in everlasting bliss. The prohibition power must be backed by the living power, the arm of the conscientious officer, in order to accomplish that for which it was created. So during these years that we have been marching along in this great reform, we wish to grasp the ideas that are to put the ballot in the hands of the women. By the ballots of men and women prohibitory laws backed by officers for their reinforcement, we shall win.

The second well known Round the World Missionary, Miss Ackermann, was next introduced.

MISS ACKERMANN: I sat last evening listening to the stories of the mothers of the crusade and I could but think as one after another spoke what wonderful days those were. One thing that one of the speakers said, impressed me very much. She spoke of starting out to visit one of the saloons and being joined by five hundred women on the way. I thought of that, five hundred women in sympathy with her. And then my thoughts turned to these days since the twenty years have passed away, since the daughters of the crusade went forth when they sent us—Round the World Missionaries—forth alone. And so after circumnavigating this great world of ours twice alone, I have come back to the dear ones of this native land to tell just a little of one lone crusade in this great world.

Some years ago under the auspices of the Independent Order of Good Templars, I started on my own first little crusade and I have been on a crusade by myself ever since. I went on that first crusade to the state of California. I was sent to the mountains because they wouldn't listen to the men and they thought the miners would come out to see a young woman. I went into the saloons. In one place I found the proprietor of a saloon exceedingly gentlemanly and he came to my lecture and after it was over took me by the hand and said, "I am never going to buy another drop of liquor while the world stands. I can't afford to throw out what I have, I have my mother to take care of." Well, I said, "When you have sold the last drop and you are out of business, write and tell me." He said, "Yes, I will." Since then I have journeyed the length and breadth of the western continent and been around this whole world and never heard from that man until last summer there came to me hundreds and hundreds of letters and among them one from this man. He told me he had kept his promise, and sold out his place. Then there came a great revival to the town and he was converted and the Lord called him to preach the gospel. He went to the theological school for three years and was appointed superintendent of the midnight mission at San Francisco. You may be sure I was glad to hear from that result of my first crusade. I have spoken in more than a thousand saloons around this globe of ours, and in dens of infamy, and vice of which I could not tell you to-night, and also in those places that seem to me sometimes as much worse than a saloon as it is possible to imagine, those frightful opium dens. I have seen countless hundreds of our race being debauched and degraded in these terrible dens, so I have come home to Christian lands with a very special message. A good many of these good ladies have come up to take me by the hand, and they have said: "When are you going away again? When do you go back, are you going back to Africa, and are you going back to China?" No, I am not going back to Africa, I am not going back to China, because I do not believe that I have a single message for the heathen. In coming back after what I have seen, after having lived with all conditions of people, if I have a single message it is to the Christian voters of the United States and the Christian voters of England.

We talk about christianizing the heathen world. Why, do you know that while one heathen is being gained for Christianity, whiskey is making a hundred drunkards, and while another heathen is being won for Christianity English opium is making one thousand opium smokers? Do you wonder that I came over to say I have no mission to the heathen of Africa or China? My mission, if I have one, is to the Christian voters of the United States and England. What can I say to men who claim to be working for the kingdom of Christ three hundred and sixty-four days of the year, and the three hundred and sixty-fifth day they go out and use the highest gift of the free born citizen in helping to advance the kingdom of Satan and drunkenness? Never can the world be won for Christ until the liquor traffic and the opium question are forever settled.

After the birthday collection was taken up, Mrs. Harris sang "Some Glad Day," the audience joining in the chorus.

Madam Chika Sakurai, of Japan, made a strong plea for her Bible training school in Tokio and asked that subscriptions be sent to Miss Willard, who is acting as treasurer for her.

MRS. ELLA F. BOOLE, of New York, was then introduced and said;

There is one thing about the crusade that has not been spoken of in these meetings, and that is the girls that used to go with the crusaders. When I was a school girl out in the western part of this state I well remember when the crusade fire struck our town. I well remember when we girls who were in school used to go out crusading in the morning before school and then at noon and at night, and while we didn't pray in the saloons as the mothers did, yet there came in our hearts that same crusade fire that has led these women on through all these years. I remember one day when they would not let the women visit the saloons any longer, and they would not even let them pray in the streets, they appointed committees to watch the front and back doors of the saloons, and these women used to take the name of every man that went into a saloon, and he was a very brave man that would go in. One day one of our women was sitting at the back door of a saloon and because she did not want to waste time she had her knitting with her, and of course, the saloon men did not like a woman sitting there upon the back door step, but this dear saint sat there, and after a time a shot was fired and she sat perfectly still, and somebody came out and shouted, "Mrs. W., don't you know that they are firing at you?" "Yes, I know." "Don't you know that they are going to kill you?" "I know that, but I am going to sit just where I am." And the spirit that was in those women was in the hearts of some of those girls, and they got their inspiration.

Next, prohibition would be a good financial investment for the state and nation. We have been suffering from hard times this past year. People have been starving for bread, hundreds of thousands have been thrown out of employment because of a low demand for manufactured goods, and for other reasons. Let me solve a mathematical problem. There was spent within the United States in the past year $1,350,000,000. If by a miracle human and divine we could put a padlock upon every one of the 240,000 saloons in this country, we would have had that thirteen hundred and fifty million dollars, because it represented a cash business. Do you know, my friends, that is more than enough to pay the national debt of this country and to pay the running expenses of the United States Government for a single year? Now, we could take this $1,350,000,000—some say this is too high an estimate, so we will deduct $150,000,000 leaving just $1,200,000,000—and then I would take this money and feed those five million people in the United States, who, it is said, from the beginning to the end of the year, do not know what it is to be without the sensation of hunger, and I would buy clothing for those who are shivering in the cold and that would make a greater demand for manufactured goods, and then I would give to those poor families some money for house rent, so they could live in more comfortable homes and I would help them out on their coal bill, and I would give to the women each a sewing machine so that they could make up the clothing that I had given them. No doubt many of you think that I would then found homes where these men could go to spend their evenings, but I would do nothing of the sort, I would have the men stay at home for awhile. If the home is not pleasant, why the women have to be there all day and all night too and so the man ought to be able to stand it as well as she. And I would subscribe for daily, weekly and monthly papers, and would give them all the good reading matter that can be had. I believe that this financial argument is one that we can use in breaking down the walls of this great liquor traffic.

The meeting closed with the singing of the doxology and benediction pronounced by Rev. S. F. Lyon.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

The convention met at 9:30 a. m., in charge of the president, and the hymn, "Come, Thou Fount," was sung, followed by prayer by Mrs. Stevenson.

The reading of the minutes of yesterday was the first business of the day, aud they were adopted.

The convention next took up the reading of the minutes of the several sections of the executive committee, which were all adopted without amendment, until the last section was reached. Some discussion was brought out as to the proposed establishment of a fund to furnish temperance literature, published by the W. P. T. A., to unions unable to supply themselves. A motion to limit this fund to voluntary offerings was lost, and the devising of a plan to raise such fund was left to the judgment and action of the executive committee.

A motion was made by Mrs. Kinney to reserve for future action by the convention the paragraph of the report of the executive committee stating that the report of Mrs. Carse on the Temple was adopted. A discussion was precipitated, Mrs. Monroe wishing to understand whether the adoption of the report of the executive committee would go out into the world as a unanimous endorsement of the report of the Temple with all that it involves.

The Chair followed by the secretary explained in detail that the action of the executive committee and the action of the convention if taken favorably upon this report would mean simply as in the adoption of other reports that a statement of the work done during the past year was received and that no Union would be bound to any action or endorsement thereby.

MRS. FORBES: Last year there was considerable misunderstanding on this point because of a report sent out by the president of the board of trustees of the Temple, Mrs. Carse. The report stated that the Temple was adopted without a dissenting voice. I am sure that those who did adopt it, adopted it simply as a report of what has been done. If it goes out this year I should not go out to our unions as an endorsement of this report. Certainly we ought not to be considered disloyal to the national organization because we do not endorse this report.

MRS. CARSE: It has been stated here that I sent out a letter declaring that the vote for the Temple was unanimous. I ask in justice that my truthfulness be established and that the secretary state how the vote stood. I ask this because I am so continuously assaulted.

THE SECRETARY: I think no one dissented.

MRS. FORBES: I am not assaulting Mrs. Carse or any one who thinks differently from myself. I simply would like to have the matter thoroughly understood.

MRS. HAMMER: Madam President, do we not understand that in adopting this report we are adopting it as we do all the other reports. As I understand there are no plans or suggestions presented in Mrs. Carse's report, no recommendations nor resolutions, merely a statement and a pledge to go out herself next year and asking us to wait another year.

MRS. HOFFMAN: This report was adopted by the executive committee exactly as all other reports have been adopted from the beginning of this organization. No single Union is bound to accept any provision in any report unless it chooses to do so and everybody knows that. There is not a particle of compulsion about this upon any state Union nor upon any local Union and has not been from the beginning of this whole controversy up till now. I noticed that you adopted the Evangelists' Report. In my state I shall not take all of those recommendations, but I didn't object to it, because I was not bound to accept them by any law written or unwritten and neither is any president on this floor bound by any law written or unwritten to touch that Temple or that Temple report in any way.

Mrs. Fessenden spoke against the amendment.

Mrs. Dunham thought that the whole trouble had arisen out of the misunderstanding of the force of the reports, and hoped that in the interests of the despatch of business the amendment would be voted down.

Mrs. Kinney by consent withdrew her amendment.

Question called for on the adoption of the report of the executive committee, and the vote taken, a large number voting aye and no dissenting voice being heard.

MRS. HOFFMAN: Is the vote unanimous? I didn't hear a dissenting vote.

MRS. FORBES: The motion is unanimous with that understanding that when we are accused at home of being disloyal to the W. C. T. U. because we do not endorse the Temple movement, with all the plans offered here, that we can say that was the ruling of the convention, according to what has been said here, that we are not obliged to do so.

Miss Anna Gordon offered the following motion which was carried unanimously:

Inasmuch as this anniversary convention is one of unusual interest I move that the corresponding secretary be empowered to send a letter of affectionate greeting and God-speed to our faithful, round-the-world missionaries, Mrs. Elizabeth Wheeler Andrew, Dr. Kate C. Bushnell and Miss Alice Palmer, Mrs. Leavitt having already received a telegram and Miss Ackermann being with us.

On motion of Mrs. Rounds a telegram of greeting was ordered sent to our ex-treasurer, Miss Esther Pugh.

The secretary read the list of appointees in the various departments and subdivisions as proposed by the executive committee. (The old officers were retained with few exceptions; the new names appear on the first page of this issue.)

Mrs. Chambers of Pennsylvania moved that these names be confirmed by vote of the convention.

Carried.

On motion of Mrs. Campbell the chairmen of the various committees were invited to the platform and introduced to the convention.

Mrs. Barker made the announcement that a little more than $73 had been received in the birthday collection of last evening, and stated that she hoped it could be made $100 at this morning's meeting.

MRS. MONROE: The oldest crusader in the house is here with her envelope with her money in it, and has not yet had an opportunity to give it; Mrs. Eliza Higgins. She is aged 83 and is from Pennsylvania.

THE CHAIRMAN: And she doesn't look like 83 at all, but still I hope to look as young as that when I am 83.

Mrs. Campbell stated, that she desired the privilege of presenting a bouquet of flowers to the lady who first met all the members of the convention, Mrs. Tillinghast. Mrs. Tillinghast acknowledged the gift in an appropriate speech.

Mrs. Clevenger on behalf of Ohio, presented a bouquet of flowers to Mrs. Alice J. Harris, saying that Ohio enjoyed the honor of having given to the world Mother Thompson, Mrs. Carpenter, Mother Stewart, Mary A. Woodbridge, Henrietta Monroe and many others, who had helped forward the great work, but the latest and crowning honor that had come to the state was that it had given to the nation and the world the immortal voice of Mrs. Harris.

MRS. HARRIS: Dear sisters from my own beloved Buckeye state, I thank you for this beautiful expression of your kindly greeting and good-will, and I want to take this opportunity to thank this entire convention for their courtesy and their kindness to me from first to last through this convention, and it is a privilege to me to say here in this presence that whatever gift I may have to be helpful to the great cause in which we are so interested, I feel is due to my blessed dear old Crusade mother. To her personal sacrifice I owe all that I can do, for giving me in my girlhood even a limited musical education and I am glad to pay this tribute to my dear mother. And now, as the time has come for us to say good by, it will be interesting to you to know that the last written line I received from our dear departed Mrs. Woodbridge, was this, written upon a postal card: "Miss Willard very much desires that our convention should learn a song that she heard at the Christian Endeavor Convention, 'No Goodby in Heaven,' and I trust you will include that in your hymn leaflet for convention use. Be sure and put it in." Now, friends, I want to sing those three verses and if there is anyone here who is familiar with the chorus, will you join in.

Song, "No Goodby in Heaven."

THE CHAIRMAN: I hope, dear sisters, that this will become a song that you will introduce not only into the local Unions, but into the State Unions, for it has a sweet cadence; we want always the cadence of hope in everything we sing and everything we do.

MRS. CHAMBERS, (of Pennsylvania): Some of us think this pretty singing will not be complete unless we have a word from Miss Anna Gordon, and would like to have her called.

THE CHAIRMAN: I think she is off upon some duty intent. The chair would like to say for Anna Gordon for the sake of the new ones who may not know that for eighteen years, it will be eighteen years in January, she has been the one who has given me the right of way to think for the society and to work and plan for it instead of being encumbered with a thousand cares, and that she is to me and growingly as the years go on, a strong, right arm to lean upon, and I know she has the love and confidence of every white ribboner, and I am glad to pay her that tribute of the older sister to the younger.

It was moved by Mrs. Ingalls that a telegram be sent to Mrs. Williams, one of our National lecturers.

Carried.

It was suggested by Mrs. Greenwood, as it was very near the hour for the devotional exercises, that the report of the committee on resolutions be taken up after those exercises, and a motion was made by Mrs. Monroe to that effect.

It was moved to amend the foregoing motion by saying that the devotional exercises come immediately after the committee on resolutions make their report, which amendment was adopted.

The telegram committee reported the following telegram:

"Miss Esther Pugh—Love and greeting."—First Thess. 3.

On motion, the report was adopted.

While the resolutions were being distributed, Mrs. Jones, of Norfolk, asked permission to make an announcement, and stated that she came from the only city in the United States which was carried by the Prohibition party, and that they stood as an object lesson to the whole United States. She then read a letter from Rev. Sam Small in regard to a Prohibition paper established in that city.

On request of Mrs. Harris, the musical director, Miss Gabriel Stewart, was spoken of by the chairman as the efficient pianist and assistant during this convention.

The chairman of the committee on reception, Mrs. Tyrell, was introduced to the convention.

Mrs. Martin stated that the ladies had been successful in securing what they had asked of the officials of the city of Cleveland, and that hereafter the women will be listened to and the law enforced with reference to objectionable posters, pictures, etc.

The report of the committee on resolutions was called for and offered by its chairman, Mrs. Rounds.

[The resolutions as far as adopted at close of noon session will be found on pages 5 and 6 of this issue].

After being read it was on motion taken up seriatum section by section, to be adopted as a whole.

Various amendments were offered and discussed, several of which were adopted and the report as amended finally adopted by the convention in the form in which it will be found a little further on.

During the discussion of amendments among other bright and earnest suggestions made, were the following:

In the discussion on Section 12, when it was suggested to insert the word "both" before the words, "prohibition" and "suffrage," Mrs. Hoffman spoke as follows:

MRS. HOFFMAN: I hope that wont carry. We want to be free to throw our influence and our strength anywhere with the party that puts in suffrage, and we will take care of the prohibition. We want to be free to work.

THE CHAIRMAN: I think Mrs. Hoffman's idea is, that so far as any party takes up the principles either of suffrage or temperance that for that thing in that party we are ready to work.

MRS. BOOLE: Would not the adoption of this amendment nullify the action of former years when we pledged our support to the Prohibition party?

THE CHAIRMAN: The understanding of the chair is that it would not, but it opens the way for us to recognize republicans or populists who have taken up the woman's ballot to some extent, to recognize that they have done so. The chair did not suppose that this was a repudiation of our position with reference to the Prohibition party nor does it place the Prohibition party anywhere, but way ahead of all the others, where it belongs.

MRS. HOFFMAN: It does not follow that because we endorsed the party one or five, or ten years ago we are going to eternally endorse that party. I am a prohibitionist out and out, but I want to be free and we are not bound to tie ourselves down, we want to be free to throw our influence anywhere. We want to be more political than we have ever been and to stand for the political party, this political party, but it will be unwise if we stand for no other. If the democratic party advocates a measure, say the three-mile law, or the four-mile law, or any other law, we want to be free to throw our influence with that party in that state, while the democratic party has the power to legislate. We endorse simply what that party brings to the front that we approve, we don't endorse anything else.

MRS. BOOLE: I believe we always have been free to do this under our by-laws, but, at the same time, I believe that there ought to go out from this convention a strong and ringing word in favor of the only party that stands for prohibition and woman's suffrage. Further, I believe that the W. C. T. U. was organized for the special purpose of securing the outlaw of the saloons. While they have adopted woman's suffrage, and I believe in woman's suffrage, I do not believe in forgetting the purpose for which we were organized. I am opposed to the amendment.

MRS. BURT: As I understand Mrs. Hoffman any party that puts equal suffrage in its platform, and ignores prohibition, we can endorse that party. There is a door left very wide open there. Now, if the democratic party, as I understand it, endorses woman's suffrage, and we are free to endorse that party, it seems to me that above all things as W. C. T. U. women, we must be true to the principle that first called us out, true to the principle that has held all these years, the great and sacred principle of prohibition. I want to say that if this resolution is adopted, even the state of New York, the democratic party would put woman's suffrage in its platform, we would not touch it. If the republican party put woman's suffrage only in its platform we would not touch it. We are for prohibition, first, last and always.

I believe there is only one party that has put them both in.

MRS. BENJAMIN: If we adopt the amendment now before us, I think we shall be clearly endorsing the prohibition party, as that has always been for prohibition and woman's suffrage.

THE CHAIRMAN: If the chair thought differently, she would be for leaving the chair and making some observations.

On suggestion of Mrs. Hunt, accepted by Mrs. Hoffman, the word "dare" was not inserted in this section.

MRS. ROUNDS: I want to say that any party that puts prohibition and equal suffrage into its platform is pretty near a prohibition party and it wont be called Republican or Democratic, so that I feel that we are on very safe grounds when we put in those words. I want to say further that I should very much regret it if there is the least shadow of turning on the part of the W. C. T. U. away from that party that has given us the only recognition that we have ever had politically. I stand here a prohibitionist from head to foot, and as radical as I know how to be, and I believe that the reason the prohibition party has not accomplished all that the W. C. T. U. would ask for it, is because they are hampered by the stultified consciences of men. We are just entering into another presidential campaign, those seasons that come every four years, when the whole country is racked and ruined by these contending forces. More than ever must the W. C. T. U. keep steady to her heavenly principles. I am a Prohibitionist.

On motion of Mrs. Benjamin, the resolution of thanks was adopted by a rising vote.

Consent was given that Mrs. Burt read a testimonial to Mrs. Woodbridge, which was also adopted by a rising vote.

It was announced by Mrs. Hoffman that the convention is invited to meet in Kansas City next year, and was received with applause.

Song—"Blest Be the Tie That Binds."

Adjournment.

[The remainder of the convention proceedings will appear in the regular convention number of UNION SIGNAL, Dec. 6.]

LEFT OVERS.

Several reports having been crowded out of the previous dailies, it is a pleasure to give them publication in this issue.

WOMAN'S TEMPERANCE PUBLISHING ASSOCIATION.

It is always a pleasant task to report an enterprise when it is in a flourishing condition, but business, even the very best, is not always at high tide, it has its ebb and flow. The past eighteen months have been the most trying time financially this country has ever seen. The wreck left by the storm is all about us, in the collapse of corporations as well as old and well known firms. Consequently it is not quite as pleasant a task to report the work of the Woman's Temperance Publishing Company as it has been in some former years. Still there is much room for congratulation; that we have weathered the storm. Let me just say here that our warmest thanks are due to two noble white ribboners, Mrs. Hannah J. Bailey and Lady Henry Somerset, for prompt aid in tiding us over dark days. While we are unable to pay a dividend to our stockholders this year, they should be devoutly thankful that we have held our own, running behind only $561, from October 1st, 1893, to October 1st, 1894.

Cash Receipts	$149,589.61.
Cash Expenditures	149,203.72.
Assets	134,749.99.
Liabilities	45,361.58.

Our rent has been reduced at 161 La Salle street $1,000 a year, and the rent at the Temple is to be reduced December 1st, $900 a year, making the total rental for both buildings $7,500.

We have in our employ now about 120 persons. Our business manager has tried to economize in every way possible; our clerical force has been reduced, making a saving of $1,200 for the year in this department. We have printed over one hundred million pages of literature the past year; of this amount over six million pages were in leaflets and tracts, books forty-five million pages; outside printing over fifty million pages.

Average circulation of UNION SIGNAL	65,000
" " "Oak and Ivy Leaf"	8,500
" " "Young Crusader"	33,750
" " "Advance Guard"	500

We are taking first rank in job, newspaper and periodical printing. If it was not for this source of income, we could not afford to carry the stock of temperance publications we have on hand, and which should be in the hands of every local union instead of on our shelves. Can this Convention not invent some method whereby more of the literature which we have had expressly prepared for the needs of our local unions, can be circulated?

NEW PUBLICATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

Books—"A Great Mother," by Miss Willard, etc., which has reached its third edition and is received with most cordial praise by the best literary critics. "David Douglas and His Wife," by Mrs. O. W. Scott, one of the most forcible presentations of Prohibition as represented by the third party; "Songs of a Home," by Eliza S. Long," an attractive booklet, and Olive Schreiner's "Three Dreams in a Desert," which has just been brought out.

Something unique in the matter of our publications has been the "White Ribbon Portfolio," evolved by the practical genius of our Business Manager, of which three numbers have been issued, and two more are contemplated.

It is well that the interests of the W. T. P. A. during the last year and a half of unprecedented financial stringency has been under the management of such a woman as Mrs. Caroline F. Grow. She has guided the affairs of the association with great wisdom and tact, and has thoroughly won the confidence of the business community. Our business is increasing so in the job line, that we have found ourselves greatly handicapped for lack of facilities to do the work offered, having to turn away many large jobs for want of capital. The stockholders should have a move soon to increase the capital stock from $125,000 to $175,000. Mrs. Grow in her report to the stockholders at the annual meeting among other things said: "What of the needs? What of the possibilities of this "splendid unworked monopoly?" as John G. Woolley terms the W. T. P. A. It needs first of all more capital, second the co-operation of the National organization in sending its publications broadcast to every State, District, County and local Union, third, your individual zeal in "exploiting its product" in your community.

The W. T. P. A. may congratulate itself upon securing the services of a woman so gifted, to fill the position of Editor of publications as Mrs. Katharine Lente Stevenson of Massachusetts. She has filled the position with great ability during the past year. In counting the gains of the year we must not forget the addition to our editorial force of Miss Ada Melville, the bright young editor of the "Young Crusader." She is a young woman of great promise and a charming writer of stories for children which even older heads enjoy reading. She is determined on making The Crusader bright, entertaining and instructive. In her annual report to the Board, she says: "More than anything else the Young Crusader needs systematic help from the state L. T. L. superintendents, and the state Superintendents of Departments of Sunday schools." Miss Jennie Stewart is showing her ability as an able editor in the transformation she has made in the Oak and Ivy Leaf, under the name of Young Women. It has been changed from a four page to an eight page paper, beautifully illustrated, spicy and bright; it is a most charming and winsome paper for young people. The price is now 50 cents a year. Miss Willard still continues editor-in-chief of the UNION SIGNAL, although at long range. The strength of her name and the power of her wondrous pen is a tower of strength to our national organ which is beyond computation, but neither she nor Lady Somerset, who is editorial correspondent, take any remuneration for the valuable work they do for the paper. In the resignation of Mrs. Harriet B. Kells—from the editorial staff of the UNION SIGNAL, we have lost a keen, incisive and able writer as well as a true and noble woman. Great credit is due our managing editor, Miss Margaret Sudduth, for her management of the UNION SIGNAL during the continued absence of Miss Willard. She has stood at the helm bravely and filled every gap with much ability and wisdom.

The Board of Directors of the W. T. P. A. has suffered a great and painful loss in the death of the beloved secretary of the Board, Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge. It is a singular co-incidence that the only two secretaries the Board has had in the 14 years of its existence have both died. These have been the only deaths in their ranks.

Respectfully submitted,
MATILDA B. CARSE, President W. T. P. A.

MRS. GROW: This is the point of my plea, this W.T.P.A. is yours. When you can arrange to set apart from the national fund and from the state fund a portion for the free distribution of literature, then, and only then, may we hope that its presses will turn out exclusively and distinctively temperance literature. I ask for your patronage, not only at home, but here and to-day. We have brought here over one thousand dollars' worth of goods. I have been told there are over five hundred delegates and those interested in this convention. If you will each of you leave with us two dollars, we shall go home without goods with our purses well filled and you will have helped to make a financial success for the coming year.

MRS. FESSENDEN: It seems to me that it would be a very appropriate thing in view of the very hard struggle of this past year of our W. T. P. A.—and I put a good deal of emphasis on our W. T. P. A. and of the wonderful amount of application and wisdom that has been brought to bear on this question, that this convention show their appreciation by making up to the W. T. P. A. the five hundred and sixty dollars reported as output.

THE CHAIRMAN: You know that Mrs. Grow by her energy and the confidence of the business men of Chicago has come through the help of the jobbing office and the contracts she has got, and kept the concern afloat. That is something everybody ought to know. It is not our patronage alone that has kept it alive. The word of this association is just as good at the banks as the word of any publishing interest in Chicago.

MRS. GROW: We thank you, Mrs. Fessenden, and ladies of the convention, for this generous offer, but we are a business house. We cannot accept anything on the side of philanthropy. Our house, though the stock is owned and controlled by women, is subject to the precise conditions of business owned and controlled by men. We have to pay our bills the same as other houses; they recognize no philanthropy on that side of the question, we recognize none on the other. We simply ask your patronage and prompt pay, and that you will use your influence for us in the regular lines of business, but I have a suggestion to make. I should consider it the best evidence that you value what I have said to you if you will raise this $500 and turn it into your treasury with the express purpose of having it given or spent in literature to be given to Unions that are not self-supporting.

REPORT OF UNION SIGNAL.

MARGARET A. SUDDUTH.

Not since the days of our lamented Mary Allen West has THE UNION SIGNAL been brought to the special attention of our national convention. We are confident that this has not been due to your lack of interest, nor to a want of zeal on the editor's part, but rather to the pressure of business at this time.

To the most of you, would it were to all, THE UNION SIGNAL gives its own report each week. Fifty-two times a year it invades your homes with peaceful, helpful intent, chronicling what you have accomplished and suggesting new fields and new methods by which to conquer intemperance.

Did you ever congratulate yourselves upon the name of your official organ? What better title could it bear, than one which combines the expressive cognomen of our society—U-n-i-o-n—with the means of transmitting intelligence—a Signal! No electric current ever united more certainly its two poles than ought our well-named and well-loved paper, THE UNION SIGNAL, to unite the executive and legislative bodies of our own blessed work.

The battery for this electric current is your own dollars. Several times during the past year you have allowed our battery to run down pretty low, but certain indications which our business manager will reveal to you now point to the fact that it will soon be fully charged again. The Ohio W. C. T. U. has given us cheer by passing a resolution declaring no white ribboner eligible to office who does not take and read the UNION SIGNAL and her state paper. While I am speaking of subscriptions may I urge our subscribers not to wrap up their own copy, put a-one cent stamp on it and forward regularly to some friend, but rather to send us the value of a two cent stamp each week and we will print and mail to that friend directly from our own presses. You will thus help to sustain the largest woman's temperance publishing house in existence rather than adding to Uncle Sam's superfluous post-office treasury.

The "right arm of service" has been often applied to our paper and none pleases us more, for 'tis service to the W. C. T. U. that we seek, and to be its right arm is indeed the place of honor and power.

As a developer of good writers, our paper has been signally successful. If the editors should ever feel inclined to be lonesome or assert proprietary rights, we have only to look on the contents of our pages to realize our numerous family of contributors as well as of readers. Aside from the editorial matter, more than six hundred writers contribute each year to the reading columns of the UNION SIGNAL. A list of these will include names of well-known authors.

If THE UNION SIGNAL has accomplished no loftier end than encouraging the white-ribbon sisterhood to express their convictions by means of the printed page, its mission need not be despised. We are confident that no other organization of women can claim so many members of ready utterance, not only by the voice but by the pen.

As a world's organ we are extending our boundaries and strengthening our stakes. Once a month we devote a page to the world's W. C. T. U. news, averaging about five countries a month. Among these are: Canada, England, India, Burmah, China, Japan, South Africa, West Africa, Ceylon, Australia, British Columbia, Madagascar, New Zealand, New Foundland, Sweden, Norway and France.

Once a month we give a separate department to Canadian news, and we have just formulated a plan for the frequent representation of the Australian provinces, which will gain us many subscribers and increase the knowledge of our work in those sea-girt lands.

Our news from the Field department has grown and strengthened until we have a wide-awake, efficient reporter for every state and territory. With this plan for state reports so well systematized, THE UNION SIGNAL was never before so completely a National organ.

We contemplate a number of improvements during the coming year, among them the establishment of a Local Union department, to which any white ribboner may bring her latest difficulty of her brightest solution. The special questions will be answered by one of the many specialists among our state presidents, national superintendents or organizers, when the editors' stock of information is exhausted.

In considering the scope of our paper it is difficult to determine any boundary lines. Our field is peculiarly free from limitations or competition. We are the accepted organ of 150,000 white ribbon women. If any one complains of the breadth of THE UNION SIGNAL let her first narrow the horizon of the W. C. T. U., for so long as it has editors who are true to their positions and loyal to the society which they represent, it will ring out in clear notes against every usurpation of W. C. T. U. ground and every attack upon W. C. T. U. interests, after they have been thoughtfully indorsed by the sacred majority. We teach temperance; that is ever our objective goal, but we also teach the fundamental and correlated truths that underlie our 42 departments, and they are as broad as the heavens,

INTERLUDES TO MISS WILLARD'S ADDRESS.

And she is here, Eliza, who led the praying band. And she is here with that head crowned with the glory of gray hairs, Mother Stewart, heroine of the Crusade.

It is a case of "the lady and the tiger."

We shall never stop till it is twenty-one.

A very literary looking reporter came to me in Boston last week to interview me, and among his questions he said: "What effect has this unexampled proceeding of Lady Henry had upon the aristocracy of England?" I said: "About the same effect that Lord Shaftsbury's splendid advocacy of the people had upon the aristocracy of England. The newsboys stood at the window and looked in and saw his pictures, and nudged one another and said, 'That is our Earl.' The workingmen in Hyde Park, when the procession of 200,000 temperance people marched there last May with Lady Henry at the head of her legion, told me that again and again the swarthy, honest workingmen pointed at her with their thumbs and said, 'That is our Lady.' But by the aristocracy she is frozen out. Not that I speak harshly of them; it is a phenomenon, they do not understand it."

You will smile, perhaps, at a little thing I put in, but I naturally noticed it more than if I had not been absent for two years (referring to chewing gum) absent.

If I were a local president I would call into my parlor half a dozen of the Populists of my own town and half a dozen of the Prohibitionists, I would get them to sit down and talk things over, I would get my little pencil and say, "Couldn't we get up a resolution that we twelve could agree on which should include the woman's ballot, which should include the eight hour law, and prohibition and these things for which we stand, and then I would get my neighbor over in the other local Union to get her neighbors together and after it had been worked up quietly in this home way, we could have a county convention and in that way do something to get our unified platform. But I went in my haste and tried to bring the heads of these two parties together, and I sat up all night with them in committee on resolutions, and tried to get prohibition forward. Couldn't get it in anywhere, couldn't even get the committee allowed to come in that wanted to speak for it. But I got the woman's ballot in and then "unbeknownst" they got it out again.

The heads of these leaders are hard. They have a mind of their own and whether it is a good one or not it is the outcome of their experience, and so I say let us try with the rank and file. May be you think that this is a bit of garrulity on my part. It is the very most important things I have said this morning. It is the thing, which, if we do it, will bring us in new light; for the Populists command 2,000,000 votes in this country and the Prohibitionists nearly half a million; and while the old parties do as well as they can "under the circumstances," the circumstances are very bad, and we are working to create a better set of circumstances.

When I say those words it brings the tears, because I think how my blessed mother used to talk to me of all these things.

I want to thank you for giving nearly $3,000 under the dime collection. The little plea that I made you just answered with $3,000, when we had but $1,000 of a debt.

know it will be a tender pleasure to you to be made aware that with us on the platform now are those whom she loved best, to whom she was bound by the tender tie of kindred and affection.

love to think of Mary as still the fragrant blossom on the dear home rosebush of the W. C. T. U. We wept when we spoke of her in the executive committee, and we wept when we spoke of Mary Lathrap shut up in her prison house of pain. Our Daniel Webster of the temperance movement, our brave, great heart. God comfort her to day. She has sent us a beautiful telegram, "Greetings to you in Christ's name. My heart is with you." Her husband writes that her pain is perpetual, but that her soul is at peace in Christ, her Saviour.

Concerning politics, that is a somewhat vital nerve. It seems to me that if we could even appoint some women to make it her specialty or attach these duties to the department of legislative petition, so that somebody could keep a lynx eye on the parties, keep the news going among our women who do not read the newspapers perhaps as much as they might, as superintendent, who should see that there was a right acknowledgment made when a step was taken in the right direction, the acknowledgment which we ought always to make to any party that takes an advance step; to the Republicans who put woman's ballot in their platform as they have in several of the new states; to the Democrats of Arkansas who have taken a step forward in that direction; and also when they sell us out as they did in Kansas, by not putting woman's ballot in at all; or when a state does not come up to Prohibition; or deals as the Democrats have done through Secretary Carlisle, with the women, turning them out of the Treasury Department; or when any of them deal with the liquor traffic in any way. Let it be understood that the hope of the women is now as it has ever been with the party that stands fair and square for prohibition and the woman's ballot. We should watch also the rising new party of the people, the Populists.

ORGANIZERS' REPORTS.

FRANCES H. ENSIGN, MADISON, OHIO.

I have worked in seven states, including Ohio; have attended three state conventions and two state Y conferences, and presented Young Woman's Work at the Lakeside, O., School of Methods. Have given forty-five addresses and thirty-five parlor talks and have organized thirteen Y unions. Our greatest need seems to be some plan by which organizers and unions can be brought together with less expenditure of time, strength and money. Our greatest encouragement is the systematic work done by the young women and the growing power of this branch as one of the most hopeful, helpful departments of the W. C. T. U.

CLARA PARRISH, PARIS, ILL.

Since our last annual meeting I have worked in the states of Indiana, Ohio, Kentucky, Illinois, Pennsylvania, New York and New Jersey, attending the state conventions of the first three named; have held eighty public and forty-five parlor meetings, organized twenty-two Y. W. C. T. Unions (assisting Miss Frances Ensign in organizing the Somerset Y in the Ohio Wesleyan University) and have added eight hundred new members to our ranks. Have written twelve hundred and thirty letters and cards, and traveled eight thousand three hundred and forty miles.

MRS. F. E. W. HARPER, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

For the year now closing there is little to report, there having been few calls for work among colored people. Part of the work in which I have been engaged has been the peace movement, anti-lynching work and mothers' meetings. The greater part of last winter was spent in Ohio, where I lectured in Columbus, Springfield and Toledo. I was also engaged for a short time in Michigan and new members were added to our organization. I have spoken at two state conventions. I earnestly hope that the time is coming when the colored people will realize that in the liquor traffic we have one of the worst foes to the peace, purity and progress of the race.

Were it true that the worst things said against the negro are sad and frightful verities, I would yet hold "the deeper the degradation, the louder the call for redemption." The problem before the nation to-day is broader than a mere racial question; it is the question of an imperilled civilization. The strength of the liquor traffic, the fearful disregard of law, the curse of the social evil, the increase of crime are only symptoms of a disease in the body politic and we need a union of the best moral forces of the nation to grapple with its ignorance and vice.

In conclusion let me suggest that an appropriation be made to carry on the work among the colored people, not as a matter of charity but of self defense for the country. The means of the colored people to sustain speakers in the field are limited, and in many instances they have little inclination to do so for themselves. Yet the work of organization is urgent and the friction between the races manifest. At least the liquor traffic as the great factor of degradation and the curse of our social life should be taken out of the way.

I stand ready to respond to calls for temperance work and mothers' meetings in any part of the country where there is local interest and Christian zeal to open the door to the hearts and homes of the people.

RESOLUTIONS.

PREAMBLE.

WHEREAS, God in His mighty Providence has brought the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union to this its twenty-first anniversary, we, the members in convention assembled, render thanks and praise unto His holy name for His care and guidance, and the prosperity that has attended our work; for the earnest consecrated women who have been our leaders, and for the uplift to humanity that has come from the combined efforts of Christian women. Encouraged by the increased interest manifested everywhere in our work, we reaffirm our allegiance to the principles of total abstinence and prohibition, and pray that the blessing of God, the Father, and His Son, Jesus Christ, may attend our work in the future as in the past.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES.

Resolved, That we rejoice that prohibition in the thought and conscience of the world is crystallizing into definite action as manifested in the position taken by the societies of Christian young people, who with firm and ringing tread, are leading American youth to good citizenship, under the white banners of total abstinence and prohibition. We commend the special movement now being made by our Young Women's Branch to interest young people in schools and colleges by organizing them into Somerset Y. W. C. T. Unions. We also hail with gratitude, the solidifying of Christian effort for total abstinence and prohibition as expressed by the attitude of religious denominations, evidencing that Christians who have long sung "Christ for the World," are now beginning in earnest to take the world for Christ.

SCIENTIFIC TEMPERANCE INSTRUCTION.

Resolved, First, that we rejoice that scientific temperance is now a mandatory study for all pupils in all public schools, in 39 states and in all schools under federal control, including those in the territories, the District of Columbia, Indian and colored schools, military and naval academies, comprising more than 16,000,000 of the children and youth of school age in this country.

Resolved. Second, that while we appreciate the good school work in scientific temperance that some faithful teachers are doing, we believe there is great need of information as to the best methods of teaching this branch.

We therefore respectfully ask The National Education Association (comprised of representative school officers and teachers, legal executors of the school laws of this country) to make permanent and adequate provision in the programs of their yearly meetings for consideration of methods of teaching all pupils in all schools the new mandatory study, viz.: the nature and effects of alcoholic drinks and ohter narcoties in connection with relative physiology and hygiene.

SABBATH OBSERVANCE.

Resolved, That we look with alarm at the increasing desecration of the Sabbath, and the demands of the Liquor Traffic for the open Sunday saloon, and call upon the executives of the law, and others in authority, as well as moral and religious people, to unite in the enforcement of such laws as do exist, and to prevent further encroachments on this Day of Rest.

W. T. P. A.

Resolved, That as intelligence in regard to our work is the first requirement for efficiency, the unions be urged to extend the circulation of our national organ, the UNION SIGNAL, and that the W. T. P. A. should receive a more loyal support the coming year than ever before.

EQUALITY OF CITIZENSHIP.

Believing that all women, as all men, are created free and equal, and that women are wronged who are governed without their consent, and that the progress of woman is hindered without the privilege of self-government, and that childhood suffers for lack of the mother element in the government, and that the nation's safety demands the influence and power of women in the administration of public affairs, we therefore resolve in favor of combined and persistent efforts for securing the enfranchisement of woman.

EQUALITY IN MORALS.

Resolved, That the National W. C. T. U. endorses with pride the heroic action of Kentucky women in their determined overthrow of impurity in high places and in their demand for the annihilation of sex in moral standards, and an equal standard for men and women.

AMUSEMENTS.

Since the character of a people's amusements so largely shapes their morals and forms their tastes,

SECTION 1. Resolved, That we recommend that each state organization instruct its unions to endeavor to secure, by law, the appointment of a committee of both men and women, who shall pass upon the character and tendency of all public spectacles.

SEC. 2. Also, as a Christian organization, we deprecate the social amusements of card playing, theatre going and promiscuous dance, believing that all such have an immoral tendency.

SEC. 3. And, while fully appreciating the value of physical development, and those athletic and out door sports calculated to give this development, we disapprove of such exercises, or such games of foot ball, as require the presence of a physician, as being injurious to physical well being, and brutalizing in their moral tendency.

SEC. 4. We also protest against the custom of inter-collegiate athletics, as demoralizing to the legitimate work of college life, and calculated to encourage the spirit of gambling.

ALCOHOLIC CURES.

While friendly to all institutions having for their object the restoration of the drunkard, we do not recognize in them a cure for the saloon evil or in any sense a solution of the temperance problem, so long as the licensed saloon exists. We do not encourage local unions to adopt this work as any solution of the temperance problem so long as the licensed saloon exists.

THE DAILY PRESS.

Resolved, That we use our personal influence with the editors and publishers of our daily press to suppress the details of murders, suicides, and the dreadful personal and pretended medical advertisements.

STRIKES.

Resolved, That we declare that the employer and the employed should unitedly decide what is best for the enterprises which can succeed only by their united effort—namely, conciliation to prevent strikes, and arbitration to put an end to them; but we strongly urge that upon state and national boards of arbitration women shall be placed.

LABOR QUESTION.

Realizing that in the deplorable condition of the great masses of the unemployed of this country many causes have contributed to bring about their poverty and degredation, and believing the solution of the labor problem to be possible, practicable and absolutely necessary,—we boldly declare that no permanent remedy for their ills can be found, nor satisfactory answer to their significant questions be secured, so long as the rum shop door stands openover against their homes and in our National Capital; also,

Resolved, That on behalf of the wage-workers and their families we protest against the licensing of a business which drains their pockets of millions of dollars annually, debauches their morals and degrades their citizenship; we protest against the delusive, deceitful shibboleth of the tariff on the one hand and the unfulfilled promises of civil service reform upon the other—as agencies obscuring the real question at issue; therefore,

Resolved, That we hereby pledge ourselves to do our utmost to secure the enactment and enforcement of such laws as shall utterly exterminate the infamous system which replenishes the National, State and municipal treasuries from the vices of the people.

PROHIBITION.

Realizing that the fusion and confusion of political parties, the cross-fire of political leaders, the steady and deadly aggressiveness of the liquor traffic all point with unerring certainty to serious consequences to the body politic, and believing the Woman's Christian Temperance Union should steadily maintain its attitude of pledged prayers and influence to any party which puts Prohibition and Equal Suffrage into its platform; therefore,

Resolved, That in order to hasten the complete overthrow of the monster iniquity of the age, the liquor system, we rejoice in the near approach of the time when we shall be able to reinforce our prayers and moral support by our ballots, and hereby pledge them to the Home Protection Party by whatsoever name called.

THANKS.

Resolved, That we render our thanks to the Federated Unions of Cleveland for their complete arrangements for the success of the convention, to the people of the city for their gracious hospitality, to the pastors of the churches who have welcomed us to their pulpits, to the pages for their effective services, to the railroad superintendent for her painstaking and successful efforts to secure reduced rates, and to all who have in any way contributed to the success of the convention, especially to the press that has so fairly and ably reported our proceedings.

IN MEMORIAM.

"Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord."

WHEREAS our beloved sister, the late corresponding secretary of the National W. C. T. U., Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge, has recently been called to the higher life, we, officers and delegates of the twenty-first annual convention of the National W. C. T. U., desire to put on record our appreciation of the heart and character of one who for twenty years was a standard bearer in the sacred cause that builds our hearts in one. Devoted in spirit, gracious in presence and kindly in speech, she was for many years a help and inspiration in our great annual gatherings. In the onward march of the past twenty years no path so rough, but she trod it unfalteringly, no call of duty went unheeded, for hers was a spirit and a life that rejoiced to do the Master's will She has gone from among us, but the eye of faith pierces the unseen and beholds her radient in the mansions of the King. The memory of her life so fragrant with good and true and devoted in service will always be a rich heritage to us.

We grieve with those who in the home are desolate over the loss of their best beloved, but to our souls come the words of Christ, "I am the resurrection and the life, he that believeth on me though he were dead, yet shall he live."

And with this triumph over death which came through the blood of the Lamb, we say, "Oh death where is thy sting, Oh grave where is thy victory?"

CONVENTION ECHOES.

A CONVENIENCE never before enjoyed at a National Convention (for which our hearty thanks are given), is the special wire placed in our Convention Hall by courtesy of the Western Union Telegraph Company. Because she is a Y, the company placed Miss Clara Wood as operator, and she has been faithfully at the service of the Convention from early morning till late at night during the sessions.

MISS ANNA CUMMINGS, now of South Africa, is a consecrated Vermont girl, who went out to Cape Colony some years ago, was a teacher in the "new Mt. Holyoke," the Huguenot college at Wellington, Cape Colony, South Africa. A year since, she returned to America for a vacation. Y Work and speaking at conventions has been her chief relaxation and enjoyment. She is accompanied by her uncle, Mr. E. A. Goodnow, the Massachusetts philanthropist, who was presented to the convention Monday.

INCIDENT in Elevator.—Winsome White Ribboner to Elevator Boy: "Perhaps this young man will wear our ribbon." Young Man, earnestly: "I'd be glad to." White Ribboner, as she pins it on: "Remember, this includes tobacco, cider and cigarettes." Young Man, with an assuring smile: "All right, ma'am."

A few days later another white ribboner, observing ribbon: "I see you are wearing our badge. I hope you will not only wear it during convention, but after we are gone." Young Man, with pride: "I intend to wear it always, ma'am!"

LADY HENRY SOMERSET expects to return to America as soon as the executive committee meeting is over, but cannot reach New York before November 24th. She has, however, most kindly agreed to come to Cleveland in time to give the "benefit" lecture in Music Hall the same one that she had hoped to give at our convention, but which will be one week later, November 25th. The proceeds of this benefit are to be equally divided between the World's and the National W. C. T. U. and comes as a part of the convention proceedings necessarily delayed one week for the reason we have given.

THE Monday morning prayer-meeting was in charge of Mrs. Burgess, Mrs. Snell not being in attendance on the convention. It was a meeting of great power. Mother Thompson's relation of her conviction, conversion and final sanctification to Woman's Suffrage under Susan B. Anthony yesterday was given in her own inimitably touching manner. She also responded with an earnest prayer to Mrs. Edholm's request that she lead in a crusade for the salvation of erring girls. The meeting expressed itself as unanimously in favor of requesting the convention, another year, to give the hour from 11 to 12 for a devotional hour.

THE Interstate W. C. T. U. Press Association met in Sorosis club room Saturday afternoon. Encouraging reports were heard from the officers. The constitution was amended to admit to membership the editor and publisher, if a member of the W. C. T. U., of any W. C. T. U. paper. Mrs. C. F. Grow, business manager of the W. T. P. A., read an excellent paper on "The Relation of THE UNION SIGNAL to State W. C. T. U. Papers." The discussion brought out plans for co-operation in extending the circulation of both State and National organs. The meeting adjourned until Monday at 5 P. M., when other topics will be presented and officers for the ensuing year be elected.

IN the production of the DAILY UNION SIGNAL we had the good fortune to make contracts for its printing with the Cleveland Printing and Publishing Company; and we find the high reputation for first-class work in all that that term implies which this company has won, is justly sustained, being certainly one of the best equipped and best organized offices we have ever seen. We feel under obligation to Messrs. Day and Staral for kindness and courtesies, and especially to Mr. Wintemberg and Mr. Tame for the efficient aid given in issuing the paper. We also wish to acknowledge the help of Misses Tiffany and White, Mrs. Howard, and of Messrs. Reiner, Pheasey and Girard. The interest shown by them made our task an easy one.

LADY HENRY SOMERSET cables that Dr. Henry S. Lunn, of London, who has in charge the plans for the World's Trip, in the interest of the Polyglot petition, proposes to make arrangements for a party to attend the convention of the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union which meets in London in June next. Dr. Lunn has assured Lady Henry Somerset that he will undertake to bring a party to London, give them a week there, a week at the famous Grindelwald Conference, three days at Lucerne, and at Paris, returning to America when desired, at a cost of $200 for each person, this to include all travelling expenses from New York and board at specified hotels. Lady Henry Somerset has cabled this information to Miss Willard in the earnest hope that many Americans will avail themselves of this opportunity to visit the World's Convention and the National Convention of the British Women's Temperance Association where they will be warmly welcomed by their English sisters.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Dr. James McCosh, the venerable ex-president of Princeton University, died November 16, at the age of eighty-three.

The funeral of the late Czar Alexander, of Russia, took place November 19, in the Cathedral of St. Peter and St. Paul, in St. Petersburg.

Oklahoma Territory has been swept with a simoon of sand, which raging for four days stopped all traffic, caused much damage to property and it is feared also much loss of life.

Recent earthquakes in Sicily and Southern Italy have resulted in the partial destruction of several villages, the death of seventy-five persons (as far as known) and a general state of panic in the affected provinces.

The national convention of the Christian Alliance in session at St. Louis, closed its meetings Sunday night with a call for volunteer missionaries. Fifty persons responded for the foreign field and fifty-four for home work.

Gen. Prudente Moraes has succeeded Peixoto as president of the Brazilian republic. He announces a liberal policy and has been assured by the rebel leaders that they will lay down their arms as soon as he assumes full control.

At the Institute of Christian Sociology held last week n Oberlin, O., various social problems were discussed by notable men, among whom were Dr. Josiah Strong and Dr. Washington Gladden. A plan is under consideration for a summer school of Christian Sociology in July, 1895.

News has been received of a horrible massacre of ten thousand Armenians by the Turks, the details of which are a sickening record of fiendish cruelty on unarmed Christians and innocent women and children, such as the darkest ages hardly witnessed, and executed, it is said, under orders received from Constantinople.

"THE twenty-first convention," said Miss Willard, "was the result of work by women who prayed as if there were no work and worked as if there were no prayer."

SISTERLY greetings were cabled to the National Convention by the British Women's Temperance Association, whose executive committee was then in session at Birmingham, England.

THE increasing disabilities of age prevented Neal Dow, the venerable "Father of Prohibition," from personal attendance at the Cleveland Convention. He was worthily represented, however, by his daughter.

COMMENTING on the procession of women wending their way to the Music Hall in Cleveland last Thursday morning, Miss Willard aptly remarked, it was a part of the funeral procession of the liquor traffic that will never cease to move.

THE Rev. Joseph Cook, from the Convention platform, congratulated the W. C. T. U. on its twenty-first birthday "because it is indisputably triumphant over prejudice and passion, times and numbers and the powers of the pit," and gave it as a watchword for the twentieth century, "The liquor traffic must be ended because it cannot be mended."

THE enforced absence of Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap of Michigan was deeply deplored by the "majority" convention and a memorial was prepared by Mrs. Hoffman containing sympathy and loving greeting and expressing the general regret that the "wise counsels and strength and eloquence" of our "Daniel Webster" would be missed from the great annual gathering. This was forwarded by the executive committee with flowers and a case containing convention program and copies of the reports.

THE roll containing the names of contributors to the ten-cent fund is now thirty yards long. In response to the president's appeal $2,762.52 has been received from America, and $38.63 from other lands.

MANY white-ribboners occupied city pulpits in Cleveland on Sunday morning by invitation of the pastors. The annual Convention sermon was preached by President James W. Bashford, of Ohio Wesleyan University, who prophesied that at the rate at which temperance reform had progressed in the last hundred years, the ultimate triumph of its principles would be seen in the twentieth century.

THE National W. C. T. U. attains its majority with a solid financial standing. The treasurer, Mrs. Helen M. Barker, reports a balance on hand of $5,681.18, with no outstanding debts, besides assets to the amount of $6,800 in interest-bearing notes and stocks, which, not being converted into cash, has not been taken into account. A remarkable showing for a year so generally disastrous to financial interests!

THE corresponding secretary's report was read by Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, of Maine, with tender allusion to the "vanished hand" which had labored so faithfully in its compilation and had so joyously anticipated Convention days. The report shows an encouraging increase in membership the past year, and gives the W. C. T. U. a following of nearly five hundred thousand, including W's, Y's, honoraries and L. T. L's.

THE 16th of December is "Peace Sunday," and in accordance with a resolution of the Second Universal Peace Congress of 1890 all people of the world are invited to unite on that day in public and private prayer for "peace on earth and good will toward men." The National superintendent of our peace and arbitration department, Mrs. H. J. Bailey, has prepared programs for the occasion, which local superintendents may procure by addressing her at Winthrop Centre, Me. The price is two cents for a single copy; $1.50 per hundred. We add our voice to hers in urging that public meetings be held wherever possible, as an effective means of educating public sentiment upon this important question of gospel ethics.

FACTS have come to light concerning the opium traffic in India, which disclose a striking similarity of conduct between government officials in that country and municipal authorities in our own. The three men, whose brave investigation of the inner working of the license system in Bombay resulted in their imprisonment, are now in England, not as they say "to talk about their own personal sufferings but to expose the tactics of the officials of the Indian government when they wish to suppress men who render themselves obnoxious by seeking to cut off a valuable source of revenue." The executive has a subtle way of evading every law passed upon moral questions by the imperial parliament, and, it appears, connives at the existence of illegal opium dens, its agents being virtually instructed to wink at the illicit traffic. The natives, say those who are in a position to know, are strongly opposed to the opium traffic, and the statement that they resent interference by the home government is totally untrue. "Christianity is on trial in this matter," say these brave-hearted reformers. May it not be said that it is also on trial in the matter of the liquor traffic the world over? How long will Christian England and America continue to be stumbling-blocks in the way of less civilized nations? How long, for the sake of "revenue," bring reproach upon the name of the Master whose teachings they profess to follow? This is a question to be answered not by Providence but by the Christian voter.

UPON the platform of the National Convention stood a fine portrait of our late corresponding secretary and beloved comrade, Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge, surmounted by a wreath of ivy gathered from vines planted by her own hands at her home in Ravenna,—speaking eloquently of her presence in the spirit and of future as well as of past ingatherings of fruit as the result of her faithful planting and watering in Christ's vineyard.

WE lament the defection of Kansas. It has lost its place as a progressive commonwealth; its best manhood is evidently not in the majority, or it would have known how to make righteousness dominant instead of remanding its right-hand helpers to the rear. There is, however, one way in which the incoming legislature can bring forth fruit meet for repentance, and that is by the adoption of a law extending presidential suffrage to women, and thus begin to retrieve the steps they have made back into the pit whence they were partly digged.

THE Congress of Conciliation and Arbitration which, under the auspices of the industrial committee of the Civic Federation, held a two days' session last week in Willard Hall, was in every sense a notable gathering, the movement, of which it is a part, being one of the most hopeful results of the distressing financial situation in general and of the great strike in particular. All classes were represented in the audiences,—capitalists, employers, laboring men, ministers of every denomination, and the general public,—and addresses were made by men and women well fitted to speak upon the subject under discussion, among them Hon. Carroll D. Wright, United States commissioner of labor, and Mrs. Josephine Shaw Lowell, of New York. At the closing session the topic, "Relation between Employer and Employé in the Building Trades," was considered and both sides ably represented. The consensus of opinion evidently was that the need was pressing for some system of conciliation and arbitration as an immediate remedy for present difficulties, and that, further, the time had come for such a readjustment of industrial conditions as should abolish the necessity for arbitration, voluntary or otherwise, because there would truly be "nothing to arbitrate."

AT 9:30 on the morning of November 16, with seven raps of the gavel, "the golden number of gratitude, love and hope," the twenty-first annual Convention of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union was called to order by the president. Delegates' seats were well filled and a quick hush came upon all as the beloved and familiar voice fell upon their ears. One hundred old Crusaders—veterans of '73—occupied raised seats at the rear of the platform, forming an impressive and suggestive "support" to the president and other well known leaders in the foreground. The decorations were as is customary at W. C. T. U. gatherings, white and yellow, reinforced by the national colors. W. C. T. U. banners graced every pillar and the balconies were draped with bunting of the prevailing colors. Miss Willard and "Mothers" Thompson and Stewart, of Ohio, led in reading the Crusade Psalm, the Convention giving the responses, and Rev. Frances Townsley, of Nebraska, offered prayer. "Welcome, Chieftain, Welcome," a song written for the occasion by Mrs. Katharine Lente Stevenson, was sung with great heartiness by the Convention, led by Mrs. Alice Harris of Boston. The president expressed her appreciation of this new and cheering "surprise" betokening the love and loyalty of the white-ribboners, and said that it had imbued her with added inspiration for the deliverance of her annual message. There was time only for a part of the address but this was listened to with rapt attention and at times with visible signs of emotion on the part of the Convention.

THANKSGIVING.

BY MRS. M. P. A. CROZIER.

Thanksgiving! Thanksgiving! November is here,
The beautiful crown of the wonderful year!
Like doves to the windows from east and from west,
The children come back to the cozy old nest.

Thanksgiving! Thanksgiving! the old folks at home
Are so glad by the fireside to see them all come;
Though the forties and fifties are silvering their hair,
They are boys yet and girls to the good people there.

Thanksgiving! Thanksgiving! sit down by the fire,
Talk over old times with the happy old sire;
Tell the mother whose hair is like new-fallen snow,
That you love her no less than in days long ago.

See the wrinkles turn smiles as she holds on her breast
The blessed new babies that came with the rest;
How she seems to grow young when a two-year-old chap
Climbs and cuddles to sleep in her motherly lap.

Oh, the home—the old home! The new may be sweet,
But not like the old to the world-weary feet;
Be it long ere the hearth-light shall fade from its walls
And the cheerful old love-light go out in its halls.

A DOUBLE THANKSGIVING.

BY LAURA J. RITTENHOUSE.

Margaret Burgess laid her violin in her lap with a sigh of utter weariness. Her sister looked up from her reading with an expression of sympathy on her sweet, old face.

"You are completely exhausted, Margaret. You must not practice so long without resting. A walk in the bracing air would do you good, now. Put on your wraps and go, won't you, dearie?"

"I'll go before it gets quite dark. I'm too tired now, Adelia. What have you been reading that has interested you so much?"

"Everything in THE UNION SIGNAL, from the first page to the last. I don't know what I should do without it, yet it discourages me, too, sometimes."

Margaret looked up startled. "Discourages, you, Adelia! Why, it buoys me up when I am most dejected."

"So it does me, usually, but to-day as I read of the great work other women are doing for temperance, and know how little we can do, I feel depressed and disheartened; as if our lives were a complete failure."

Margaret's face grew grave.

"That is true, Adelia. Of course we can wear our white ribbons, pay our dues and once in a long while steal time to attend a meeting, but I can't see that we accomplish a thing. Oh, dear! why can't we have money or time or influence to help a cause so precious? If we could only use our tongues to warn and persuade others our poverty would not matter, but we are so painfully self-conscious we sit dumb as stones, while other women say the wise and helpful things that fill our hearts."

There was a moment of despondent silence.

"Somehow I feel so ow-spirited to-day, Margaret. I keep thinking of the days when we were happy, care-free girls, with father and mother here to love us. It seems so hard to be old and poor, especially to have that dreadful mortgage hanging over us. How shall we ever pay it?"

"I don't know, dear, but I have a blind faith that we shall be able to pay it, and that our little home will once more be ours, in very truth. Perhaps I shall get more pupils, or our ladies may yet give you more sewing than you can do for the holidays. These hard times cannot last always," Margaret said, hopefully.

"Yes, there certainly must soon be a change for the better, but not in time to save our home, I fear. The mortgage is due the 29th of November—Thanksgiving day. A dreary, dreary day it will be for us if we lose this dear little house where we were born and father and mother died. I think it would break my heart." And the tears that had been lying near the surface all day, suddenly ran over and poured down Adelia's thin, pale cheeks.

"Don't cry, sister. I do not believe God will send such a sorrow upon us. Though every one else deserts us I still have faith in Him."

"I wish I had too, Margaret, but to-day I can see no sunshine anywhere," Adelia said with quivering lips.

Just then they heard a timid, half-apologetic knock on the kitchen door.

Adelia rose, but Margaret pushed her gently back into her chair.

"I'll go, dear. It's a tramp, of course. Poor wretches they, at least, are worse off than we."

Then she opened the door, looking out into the twilight inquiringly.

A rather well dressed young man with an intelligent, refined face stood before her, hat in hand. He was very pale and shivering as with an ague.

"Madam, I am hungry and half ill. I have looked everywhere for work but can find nothing. Have you anything I can do to pay for something to eat? I've tried to pawn some of my clothing but could not."

Miss Margaret looked at him scrutinizingly. He bore her intent gaze with unshrinking, honest eyes, and she felt that he was telling her the truth.

"We have no work," she said kindly, "but you may come in and I'll see what I can do for you."

Adelia had followed her sister into the kitchen and had touched a match to the fire that was ready for lighting in the cooking stove.

The cheerful blaze was already beginning to send out a pleasant warmth, and as the man stepped into the little room he thought he had never seen a place so exquisitely clean.

Margaret gave him a chair near the stove, then she and Adelia withdrew for a moment and held a consultation in the sitting-room.

"He isn't a common tramp, Adelia. One can see that at a glance. How does he happen to be tramping, I wonder, and what shall we do with him? I feel as if it would be a shame to have him eat in the kitchen, don't you?" And Margaret's face wore a troubled air.

"Yes, I do. Let us have him come to the table with us. He can't contaminate us, and we may do him good, poor fellow. The only thing that worries me is that we have so little food. There's only half a loaf of bread, two slices of soup meat and about two spoonsful of salad; hardly enough for one person; not enough for a hearty eater," Adelia said anxiously.

"There's one egg in the closet. We can poach that for him. The shell will do to clear the coffee in the morning, and I really don't feel hungry to-night, so he can have my slice of meat. We can toast the bread and butter it just a little (we haven't much butter, you know), and that will be more tempting for a half-sick man. With a cup of steaming tea I am sure that will be nice enough for any one. I'm really glad I have no appetite to-night, so the poor fellow can have two pieces of toast."

Adelia looked at her sister and shook her head.

"I don't believe a word of it, Margaret. You're just as hungry as I am. You're only pretending, not to worry me when you give up your share of food. I notice your appetite always fails when a hungry man appears," she said, lovingly.

Then they bustled around, toasting the bread, poaching the one egg, making tea and setting the table as daintily as if they were preparing for an invited guest.

The man looked on gratefully. Pictures of his own home and of his mother and sisters kept crowding upon him. Were they thinking of him now? Were they praying for the headstrong, dissipated boy who had left them in very shame of his own weakness?

The better part of his nature, the real manliness began to assert itself in the presence of these refined and gentle women, and when he was invited into the cheerful room where the neatly laid table awaited them, in his weak and half-starved condition it was all he could do to keep down the tears.

The bunch of autumn flowers in the quaint old bowl, the silver spoons worn light and thin, the delicate, old-fashioned china that had been in the Burgess family for half a century, the snowy linen, everything reminded him of his own forsaken home. But he ate with keen relish the simple food, in his hunger failing at first to notice how small the quantity his entertainers ate.

With newly-awakened sensibilities it was not long, however, before it began to dawn upon him that these two dear old souls in giving him food were doing without themselves.

"You two are scarcely eating, at all," he said abruptly. "I'm afraid I am robbing you."

Margaret spoke up in nervous haste: "We ate very heartily at dinner, and are not hungry at tea-time. Pray do not imagine you are robbing us," and Adelia indorsed the generous evasion.

After tea, the man arose to go, grateful words coming so fast he could scarcely utter them.

"Wait a minute," Adelia said, motioning him to a chair.

Then again she and Margaret held a consultation in another room.

"We could put him in father's room, to-night. The poor fellow will have to stay on the street if we do not. I am not afraid to trust him."

"I am glad you thought of it, Adelia," Margaret said earnestly. "People would think us silly and laugh at us if they knew, but we need not tell. Let us make him comfortable one night, at least, poor fellow."

So they went back and invited him to stay all night.

He accepted gratefully, surprised and deeply touched by their confidence in him, a total stranger.

After the tea-things were washed, Margaret played the violin for him. Her execution was remarkably good, her tones so pure and sweet and the class of music she played of such a high order, that the young man listened in astonished silence.

Though a connoisseur in music, he had rarely heard a sweeter performer, and it seemed as if this feast of melody was the only thing needed to open his heart to his gentle entertainers. And, so, after Margaret with caressing fingers had put her beloved instrument in its case, he told his history.

It was the oft-repeated one of intemperance; of overweaning confidence in his own strength; of drunkenness, disgrace and flight from his luxurious home.

Then had followed attempts to find employment, but the great strike had flooded the country with skilled workmen seeking positions, and he sought in vain.

The drink-demon had accompanied him in his wanderings, too, till to-night when he came to them discouraged and hopeless, he was ready to take his own life.

With hopeful, encouraging words the sisters strengthened him, forgetting in their sympathy to be timid or hesitating in their speech.

They told him of their own struggles, too, of the mortgage over their home, yet, withal were so hopeful, so trustful and kind that the man's heart swelled with new and noble resolutions.

And so it was that before he left the little home next morning he had signed a temperance pledge, and promised to go home and lead a better life.

In their uneventful lives this incident was something long to be remembered, and the two old ladies often talked of the young man, hoping and praying he had kept his promises to them.

October passed swiftly, and November came, bringing no increase of patronage to the sisters.

Even Margaret had lost hope when, the night before Thanksgiving they sat down to their supper of dry bread and tea, with only twenty-five dollars saved up to pay off a mortgage of one hundred dollars.

The worst had certainly come, and to-morrow the home so filled with tender memories would be theirs no longer.

Each for the other's sake tried to appear cheerful, but the bread remained uneaten and the tea grew cold in the thin cups, till finally Margaret dropped her head upon the table and cried as if her heart would break.

"I can't bear it, Adelia; oh, I can't bear it!" she sobbed.

At that moment some one knocked and a little boy opened the door and thrust his head in long enough to throw Adelia a letter.

"Postmaster sent it down; said it had been there two days," he explained.

Adelia picked up the missive with trembling fingers. Letters were rare for them and this one made her nervous.

As she opened it a check for two hundred dollars fluttered into Margaret's lap.

She gave a half-frightened cry as she picked it up.

"Oh! what can it mean," she gasped, while Adelia, with white face and shining eyes read:

"I was a stranger, poor and hungry, yet you took me in and fed and comforted me, and rescued me from a life of degradation and sin. Through your gentle influence the hearts of my loved ones are glad to-day, and a real Thanksgiving is once more a possible thing for them and me. Will you not then, take this money which I shall scarcely miss, to lift that blighting mortgage from your home?

"May God care for and make you ever as helpful and blessed to others as you have been to me.

"ARTHUR HALLIDAY."

They fell into each other's arms then and cried for joy.

"God has remembered us," said Margaret, with tender reverence.

"And to think that we, in our quiet, stupid way, without money, influence or eloquence have done so grand a work for temperance after all," said Adelia gratefully.

"And to-morrow we'll have turkey and cranberry sauce and celery and fruits, and ask our poor neighbors to come and feast with us," said Margaret. "In our own home, by our own fireside with all our hearts we will love God and celebrate a true Thanksgiving."

A PRIMITIVE PROHIBITIONIST.

BY MARTHA YOUNG.

One of the most beautiful sights that our semi-tropical country affords the traveler from the North is our abundance of Cherokee roses. Great hedges of them edge our roads and byways; hedges eight or ten feet in height, as many in thickness; full of thorns as is a reformer's path, and bright with white stars of blossoms as is a reformer's heart with bright hopes and beauteous thoughts.

These roses keep alive, in a land that knows them no more, the name of the "rightful lords of yore," the brave, gentle tribes of Cherokee Indians. The Cherokees take their name from their heaven of fire, Cheera; their priests, possessors of divine fire, were called the Cheera-Tah-Gee. The rose with its calyx of pure white about a gleaming center of gold—like a white urn holding a blaze of the sacred fire—is well-nigh all that is left to remind the wayfarer of the people and their religion.

It was in North Carolina that the Cherokee tribes, encouraged by their pale-faced neighbors, embraced the benefits and comforts of civilization. In 1806 two deputations from the Cherokees waited upon the President, Thomas Jefferson, to make known to him their desires.

The deputation from the lower or coast towns preferred a request that they and their households might be allowed to seek new hunting grounds beyond the Mississippi. The deputation from the upper or hill towns requested permission to remain unmolested in the homes of their fathers, where from their new and kindly disposed neighbors they might learn the arts and industries that would enable them to become a prosperous and civilized people. The requests of both deputations were granted.

Thus it happened that in the Indian settlements about Qualla Town there was made later one of the foremost moves in America toward the greatest reform that this century has witnessed—a move from intemperance to temperance.

The cognomen, Old North State, by which her denizens fondly designate North Carolina, might well be changed to the Pioneer state, for in almost every great advance in our history we find North Carolina making the first bold step.

On Roanoke Island on the coast of this state, the English first set foot, on the 13th of July, 1584. On that island Captain Amidas and his men knelt after their perilous voyage to utter the first English words of thanksgiving to the Lord of All ever offered on American soil. Here the voyagers found "a people most gentle, loving and faithful, and such as live after the manner of the golden age."

In this state was made the first bold move against submission to England's unjust taxation of the colonies. Before ever the world-famed tea was thrown overboard at Boston, John Ashe and Waddell, of North Carolina, had, with their brave followers from the counties of New Hanover and Brunswick, boarded the Diligence, a sloop of war loaded with the detested stamp paper and anchored in Cape Fear river, had terrified the captain so that he made no attempt to land the paper, seized the boat of the sloop, and carried it in procession with flags and music to Wilmington, amid the illumination of a rejoicing city. This done, these intrepid leaders forced the representative of royalty itself to take a solemn oath not to attempt to execute the detested duties of his office as stamp-master.

This state was our pioneer in making a declaration of our independence, for at Charlotte, North Carolina, was our first Declaration of Independence declared, May 20, 1775. She was our pioneer of revolution, for the blood of our people was first shed for liberty by English troops at Alamance on the 16th of May, 1771.

Here, also, were made the earliest steps toward a total abstinence society. No longer did the natives of that lovely land live as in "the golden world"; the colonists had brought with them the curse of both whites and Indians, the destructive "fire-water." The demon of alcohol was bred in those native vineyards of heretofore harmless grape, the delicious scuppernong of the South. The misery of riotous drunkenness and all its attendant horrors, was enfolding the Cherokee warrior in its baleful meshes. Then rose the two great benefactors of their nation: Se-Qua-Tah and the chief, You-Na-Guska. Se-Qua-Tah's wonderful work preceded You-Na-Guska's by almost a decade. Doubtless his labors and success made ready the fallow fields for the sowing of great resolves and noble thoughts by his chief.

Se-Qua-Tah came by chance upon a torn bit of printed paper. He knew no character or letter of English, but he recognized as he gazed on this scrap of paper that those marks made a means of communication between the whites. It was, he felt, a means of speech that distance could not blur. It was a silent communication that revealed all that speech could relate. These marks could, he knew, make a record of events that the dust of all the ages could not mar.

He first fancied that for each spoken word there must be its own written symbol. With this idea he set out to plan a great invention, a making of that which was not in the world before—a written language for his people.

But to fit each one of the musical words of the Cherokees to a symbol of its own made so vast a number of signs that no human being could hold them in memory. Months of lonely labor he spent over his self-imposed task, when at length the inspiration of forming a language of syllabic symbols came to him. By keen observation and study he ascertained that there were about eighty-six variations of sound in the language of his people. These sounds being with utmost ingenuity fitted each with a character or sign, and, the language thus reduced to a system, his success was complete. Three years after the completion of his system, Se-Qua-Tah emigrated West, but he had left a blessing whose richness was incalculable. The Bible was soon published in the Cherokee language, and world-old truths were read by Indians in their native tongue.

Yet to the rapid progress now opened to the Cherokees toward Christianity and higher civilization, one mighty barrier remained—intemperance. This vice taught by the whites and too readily learned to the ruin of these sons of the forest, was fast sinking the remnant of the Cherokee nation, left in Carolina, into degradation. It was in the year 1830 that You-Na-Guska began his great reform and thereby placed the keystone to the rising prosperity of his few remaining tribes.

This chieftain became convinced that intemperance was the root of all the evils that assailed himself and his people. He saw nothing before them but complete destruction if intemperance held sway longer among them, for William H. Thomas, later their business chief at Qualla Town, wrote of them: "Until the year 1830 they were as intemperate as any other Indians on our frontier."

You-Na-Guska determined to become himself an abstainer and to persuade his tribe to follow their chief in this as faithfully as they would follow him on the war-path. He caused to be written for him in the language of his people,—the native written language not then a decade old,—the first total abstinence pledge penned in America for presentation to a proposed association. It read: "The undersigned Cherokees, belonging to the town of Qualla, agree to abandon the use of spirituous liquors."

From a letter from William H. Thomas to James Graham (see Wheeler's History of North Carolina) we quote the account of an eye-witness to this early total abstinence meeting:

"I was present when he (You-Na-Guska or Drowning Bear) assembled there. . . . On that occasion he informed his people that he had been considering and devising ways to promote their happiness in future. He said he had become convinced that intemperance was the cause of the extermination of the Indian tribes situated in the neighborhood of the whites; referring them to the present and previous situation of the Catawba or Inctahquo Indians with whom they were acquainted, as an evidence of the injurious effects of intemperance. . . . He then brought forth the pledge which he had caused his clerk to write, and," continued Thomas, "it was immediately signed by the old chief, who was followed by the whole town. He then told them that he had served them upward of forty years without any pecuniary consideration whatever, his entire object being to promote their interest. He was pleased to see that they yet had confidence in him. . . .

"To the above cause (temperance) is to be attributed their present state of improvement. The time previously spent in scenes of dissipation is now spent in useful employment. Each family is now capable of reading the Scriptures in their own language, manufacturing their own clothing and understand farming and the mechanical arts as well as their white neighbors, to whom they are indebted for kind treatment, and a friendly disposition in advancing them in improvement." . . .

Thus by one man's wisdom, determination and example was a remnant of an old race preserved and upbuilt in the land of their fathers. Such is the history of one of the first and most moving temperance speeches on our continent. Such the story of improvement and advancement that followed then and will follow always in the wake of the whole-hearted temperance reformer.

The one earlier temperance society was formed in 1826, the American Society for the Promotion of Temperance. But this most probably was like other early temperance associations, one commending temperance rather than total abstinence, forbidding not all alcoholic drinks, but only distilled spirits, as whisky and brandy.

In 1840, ten years after You-Na-Guska's reform, six men convinced of the vice of intemperance signed in Baltimore a total abstinence pledge; out of this grew the Washingtonian Temperance Society. It is claimed that that movement set on foot by six determined men resulted in the redemption of no less than a hundred and fifty thousand men from the clutches of the demon alcohol.

In 1846 Maine became the pioneer state in making prohibitory laws. She forbade in her borders the making or sale of intoxicating liquors as beverages. Thus step by step in our great Republic advanced the greatest reform of the nineteenth century.

To the slow but sure step by step down the decades was added new strength and a power and swiftness as of wings when the women of the Crusade lifted their white banner, unfurled the white ribbon and adorned themselves with the white rose of temperance.

SHALL THERE BE A NEW PARTY?

A SYMPOSIUM.

Soon after Mr. Woolley's address before the Cincinnati Conference, a copy of that address, with the following letter, was sent to nearly two hundred ministers throughout the country, though chiefly within the Methodist Episcopal church.

DEAR FRIEND:—I enclose a copy of John G. Woolley's speech delivered at the Cincinnati Conference, September 6th. Please read and "pass it on."

Will you give THE UNION SIGNAL a few words,—for a symposium of the opinion of ministers of the Gospel,—stating if, as "an ambassador of Christ," you are ready to join in "a trumpet call to Christian men everywhere, ignoring parties one and all, to meet to form a new, clean party in our politics"? God help you to choose!

With best wishes

Yours for Christian politics,

HARRIET B. KELLS,
Editor The Union Signal.

The Temple, Chicago, Ill.

The replies have not been as many as we had hoped, but we publish those received, trusting others may be inclined to send in their contributions when once the ball is seen to be "a-rolling."

From one whose name is everywhere the symbol of authoritative judgment have come,—

SEVEN PRE-REQUISITES.

1. Let no rumseller be admitted to church membership. This is the almost universal Protestant rule, and is becoming the Catholic.

2. Let no church member vote to legalize rumselling. There are about five millions of church members who are voters in the present population of the United States. It is flat self-contradiction and moral dishonor for the churches to refuse to admit liquor-sellers to membership and then allow their members to vote to legalize liquor-selling. The Methodist church declares that "the liquor traffic can never be legalized without sin." The Presbyterian church affirms that "no political party has the right to expect the support of Christian men so long as that party stands committed to the license policy or refuses to put itself on record against the saloon." United in support of these principles, the five million voters among church members might bring any political party to terms, or else found a new party and successfully reorganize politics in the interests of morals, economy, law and order. As Neal Dow said at the Staten Island celebration of his ninetieth birthday: "When Christians say go and vote go the liquor traffic will go." When the path to political preferment leads through the gin-mills free government is a farce, and its future is likely to be a tragedy. No political party in the United States can be permanently preserved in whisky.

3. Let scientific temperance education be introduced into all public schools. It is now mandatory in thirty-nine states and all the territories.

4. Let educational, religious and political temperance effort go hand in hand in support of total abstinence and prohibition.

5. Let the hour of peril from the liquor traffic be the hour of the crystallization of an overwhelming public sentiment against it. As municipal misgovernment, under the sovereignty of the saloon, increases, the liquor traffic is very likely to commit some great atrocity, such as slavery committed when it fired on Fort Sumter, and so cause a colossal uprising against itself.

6. Let our watchword be, No Sex, No Shirks, No Simpletons in Suffrage. This means a reading test, compulsory voting, and then, but not till then, female suffrage.

7. Let us harmonize temperance forces among themselves, so that we can secure a long pull, a strong pull and a pull all together.

Given these seven pre-requisites, and as the nineteenth century abolished slavery in the American Republic, so the twentieth will make the liquor traffic an outlaw.

From the office of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal church, and from one of its corresponding secretaries, comes this

NOTE OF CHEER.

Party claims, as such, sit lightly upon my shoulders. I am not, nor will I ever be guilty of party idolatry. I sup port a political party only when it represents principles that I can endorse and defend. Upon this ground I have for a dozen years acted with the Prohibition party. On all important questions and particularly upon the question that is greatest of all, the prohibition of the liquor traffic, that party more nearly than any other represents my views. But if a new party can be brought into existence, one that unfurls the prohibition banner and proposes to carry it at the head of its columns until the liquor traffic is wiped out, advocating at the same time other needed reforms, I am ready as "an ambassador of Christ" to join in a "trumpet call to Christian men everywhere, ignoring parties, one and all, to meet to form a new, clean party in our politics." Respectfully,

A. B. LEONARD.

From the Cincinnati conference there has come

A QUARTETTE OF ASSENT.

Yours of recent date containing a copy of speech by John G. Woolley before our conference, is at hand. In reply allow me to say, that while I am a member of the Prohibition party and have voted its ticket for the past eight or ten years, I am ready at a moment's notice to join any party or combination of men and women who are ready to fight the saloon to its death. I believe in the destruction of the American saloon, and I do not care what means are employed for its destruction so they are honorable. Count me in on any line or with any party that has for its avowed object the destruction of the saloon, and is not afraid to say so in terms too plain to be misunderstood. Yours for prohibition,

D. LEE AULTMAN,
Madisonville, O. Pastor M. E. Church.

I am in receipt of yours of recent date, asking my co-operation in an effort to destroy rum, and to organize to that end. I am ready for anything that will kill this monster that is doing so much to hinder the work of the church and make this fair land a stench in the nostrils of Christian men and women. No use trying to chain him with license high or low—the prohibition bludgeon is the only instrument for Christian people to use.

Yours very truly, V. F. BROWN,
Troy, O. Pastor M. E. Church.

I can say in reply to your note, that as a minister of the Gospel and a Christian voter, I am governed by my convictions of right, and not by party ties. At present the Prohibition party best represents my principles and views. But I do believe that we need a new party of reform, a party in which all Christians and good people can and will unite for a clean and righteous government. I stand ready to hail such a party and give it my support.

Yours truly, PHILIP TROUT,
Pastor M. E. Church.
New Burlington, O.

I most heartily indorse John G. Woolley's Cincinnati Conference address from the Alpha to the Omega of it. I now belong to the Prohibition party and have for six years; if anything better is in sight I'll join on probation. Yours for God, Home and Native Land.

Sincerely, B. D. HYPES.

A COMMON SORROW.

BY CARRIE LEE CARTER.

Two hours in a freight train traveling through a desolate, dreary country. Bare trees, yellow and dead grass and leaves, and everywhere water, water, water! Not clear, sparkling streams, but swamps and dismal pools. It is a day in early February, rain has been coming down in torrents for weeks, the earth has a drenched appearance, the sky is dull gray, clouds and mist reign supreme, and I am sighing because there is yet another hour's ride before I shall reach the town where I am to lecture. Not another woman on the train, two drummers and several natives of the country are the only other passengers. The drummers have been on the platform smoking, and re turn bringing the fumes of tobacco with them; the other men are chewing and spitting, while I sit with skirts drawn tightly about me, trying to keep safely out of their reach.

Like the nursery song, "Now we go, now we go, now we stand still," for we have stopped suddenly in the damp woods. Is it a tank and have we halted for water, or has the train stopped for the accommodation of some passengers? The drummers go out to investigate and return with the news that the road has been partly washed away at a little bridge just above and we shall have to wait here for an hour or two while it is being repaired. Delightful prospect this! We are near a section house, and red-shirted section hands are hard at work.

Not far from the track is a structure which the natives dignify by the name of house, and it better deserves the title than any others along the road, for it has not only two rooms, but a glass window in each, decorated with white curtains. There is a fence around the yard, too, and a plank walk leading to the gate, which swings disconsolately on one hinge. As I take in all these details, a woman, middle-aged and shabby, comes to the door and looks for a long time at the train and then scans the dismal scene in all directions. Surely her life must be a dreary one.

I sit and muse for a time on the wonderful variety of life which is portioned out to the inhabitants of the world by relentless and resistless fate. While I muse, as is the way of women, the men, as is the custom of their sex, betake themselves to the scene of action,—that is, to the washout. Left alone a sudden resolution takes possession of me,—I will call on that woman and exchange civilities with her instead of sitting here alone.

The decision is no sooner made than I proceed to carry it out, and descending from the car pick my way carefully through the water on logs and clumps of yellow grass to the gate. The woman evinces much surprise as she civilly invites me to "come in, take a chair and sit down." The room has one other occupant, a young girl who is stretched upon the bed, apparently indifferent to everything. Seeing me glance in her direction, the woman says:

"My girl, Lucindy, had a shakin' ager to-day and she don't feel as chirk as usual."

In answer to my inquiries she reveals the fact that "agers" are the oldest inhabitants of the country, and they show their resentment to new-comers by giving "the shakes" to any who invade their territory.

"Yes," says my hostess, "we eat quinine here as regular as vittles, and never feel very well neither. 'Pears like this country ain't healthy."

As I looked at the pale faces and then at the water and decaying vegetation all about, I agreed with her. The room was neat and orderly, the two beds covered with calico quilts blazing in red and yellow blocks and stars; through an open door I had a view of tin pans hanging on the wall and other utensils, which told me that here was the "stove-room." The lady of the house now resumed work on a "nine patch" quilt which she had laid down at my entrance, and I told her that I had taken the liberty to come because I was tired and lonely waiting in the train.

"Don't you find this rather a dreary place to live?" I ask.

"Dreary? Well, yes, sometimes it does get sorter tiresome, 'specially in bad weather, but in spring and summer, when birds are singin' and the flowers are bloomin' all round, me and Lucindy never think of gettin' lonesome."

"Surely, you two do not live here alone?" is my next venture.

"Oh, no, but my husband and my boy Jim are not at home much during the day; both of 'em work on a farm a mile from here."

To my inquiry as to how long they had lived here, she said it was "nigh on to ten years sence they had come over from Illinoy." She now seemed to think it was her turn to catechize, for she inquired where my home was and whither I was bound. I explained to her my mission and work for the temperance cause by means of the W. C. T. U.

"What, you ain't one of them wimmen speakers, are you? La, me! I never expected to see one, and you look like other wimmen, too! I've always heard tell—if you'll excuse me—they were terrible folks, but I shan't believe it any more, and as for temperance, wimmen ought to work for it, for I am sure they have to suffer enough." And here she closed her lips so firmly as to make me know that she had suffered.

But afterward when she asked me to tell her something about what the women were doing, I explained to her our system of work, told her of the Crusade which was the beginning of the movement; told of our brave and much loved leader; of the thousands of women in every state in the nation, who wear the white ribbon; of our round-the-world missionaries; of our publishing house and the millions of pages of literature sent out every year; of our work with the children, and of our great National Conventions, while she sewed rapidly and Lucinda sat on the edge of the bed and listened in open-eyed astonishment.

"There, Lucindy," said her mother, "I told you that I always believed wimmen could do such things, but I didn't know they was doin' it. You see, I've done a good deal of thinkin' since I've lived in these woods, and me and Lucindy have often wondered why wimmen had to be always tormented by men's drinkin' and meanness. I oughtn't to say meanness, though, for my John never was mean, it is only the hateful whisky that makes him act so bad sometimes. For I might as well tell you, ma'am, that my man drinks, and if it wasn't for that we might be happy and prosperous now. How often I think of our house and little farm where we lived when we were first married, for John was sober and steady then and we both worked hard and saved for years. And then, when we was doin' so nice, John took to drinkin'. It came about this way,—John had a good many friends in the village and when he went to town to trade, some of 'em was always asking him to take a drink, and sometimes he did. And then of course he would have to treat, or else be called stingy, and he couldn't bear that. I 'lowed he'd been drinkin' several times when he came home, and talked to him about it. But he said he just went to the saloon because his friends went there (the best men in town) and to be sociable,—said he didn't take enough to hurt and could quit whenever he wanted to. But soon he did take enough to hurt,—I'll never forget how bad I felt the first time he come home drunk, how I kept the children away from him, how I got him to bed, where he slept off his drunken stupor, how ashamed he was next day and how he promised me never to drink again. But oh! how could he help it, with the temptation always there and the appetite within him. He was drunk again before long and for two years we lived a miserable life, while he neglected the farm, got in debt and drank all the time. But John is a good man and was always sorry and ashamed of himself when sober, but he couldn't resist that saloon, it seemed to be always a-drawin' him.

"I begged him for the children's sake to stop, but he just couldn't, and so after awhile the farm was mortgaged, and then sold, and we had no home. John had a friend livin' out here in Missoury, who wrote to him that if he would come to this town (the railroad was just built then) he could get plenty of work and good pay. So we left the old home and friends—but it was hard to do—and John said he was determined to let drink alone and be a respectable man. And he did, for a year, and we lived in a nice little house, the children went to school, and we was all happy, until one day he come home drunk again—for it seemed like he couldn't stand the temptation of the saloon any longer. It was always open, invitin' and temptin' him in, and so one day when a friend asked him to go and take a drink he went, and after that couldn't keep away any more. And other men went there and spent money that was needed for food for their families and drank away their honor and their brains, and sometimes committed awful crimes, and still the town licensed the saloon, and seemed to think it was all right. Well, we lived that way for a year, and I was always uneasy when John was out of my sight, for how could I tell what he might do or what might happen to him when he was drinkin'? Then we moved out to this place, and now John works on the farms around here and hardly ever goes to town, for he is a good man and wants to do right, but there is the one temptation that he can't stand. And now, my boy Jim, I can't help being worried about him, for I can't keep him by me all the time, and whenever he goes to town I think of that open saloon always invitin' him in, and all I can do is pray that he'll be delivered from evil. And I've often told Lucindy that if men don't get sense enough pretty soon to stop this business wimmen will be obliged to go to work and do it."

I told her that so many women had arrived at that conclusion after years of pain and sorrow, and after pleading and praying to God and men, that at last they had taken up the work, believing it to be their solemn duty and one never to be laid down until our land is free from the curse of the licensed traffic in souls.

Then my hostess with tears in her eyes said, "May God bless the women of the W. C. T. U. and keep their white ribbons wavin' for purity and truth!"

A gleam of sunshine came slanting through the door, brightening the dreary scene, and catching the animated look of hope which beamed upon our faces. At this moment, "All aboard!" was heard from the train, and I was reminded once more of time and place. Bidding a hasty good-bye, I was soon speeding on my way, with many thoughts of the sad story I had heard, but still remembering that,

"In the long years of God,
In the paths yet untrod,
The world shall yet be led,
Its heart be comforted."

Dexter, Mo.

EVEN to the least gifted in expression, the most inarticulate and dumb, death is the mighty poem that idealizes all earthly relations, that changes the point of view. Life has taken a new face; death has ceased to be wholly unknown. We have entered with another spirit into the cloud and into the shadow. The unknowable has thinned a little at its edges. The hereafter is no longer an unexplored land. We have had glimpses, we have heard voices, there have been visions granted us; and all the consciousness of seeing and believing breaks into song. Like terror and pity, it purifies the sources of our nature choked with worldliness. The sluice-ways of inspiration have long been dry and dusty. Death and grief send new spring torrents charged with divine meaning. Who is there among the living who has not made one tender song in the night of his sorrows?—Christian Register.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Theodore F. Seward is the name of one long associated in the public mind with thoughts of music and the Tonic Solfa system. More recently he was prominent in the Parliament of Religions, and as the secretary of the Brotherhood of Christian Unity, which that great gathering evolved. As the result of his noble Christian life of thought, study and action, he has just given to the world a pure and beautiful volume entitled, "The School of Life, or Divine Providence in the Light of Modern Science; the Law of Development Applied to Christian Thinking and Christian Living." It is published simultaneously by Bagster, in London, and James Pott & Co., 114 Fifth Ave., New York city. Perhaps the animus of this rare volume cannot be better stated than in the lines inscribed on the title page: "Religion and science by virtue of their affinity will one day meet, and the world will get what it needs and cries for, not a new religion, but the revelation of Revelation."

Fate frowned upon me in my thoughtless youth;
I shrank in fear, I trembled 'neath the rod,
But life hath taught me well this deeper truth—
The frowns of fate are but the smiles of God.

The effort of Mr. Seward has been to reproduce in language, choice but simple, the outcome of his own life-study in relation to the scriptural doctrine of the universal providence as confirmed by modern science; to show the purpose of creation, the providential relation of individuals to historic events and the divine plan for every life. He vividly describes what he calls "the great insanity," which is, living for this world. He sketches our school-masters who are uncertainty, suffering, death, catastrophe, nature—and describes our course of study. He illustrates the law of growth as God's great example of spiritual alchemy, and describes prayer in its relation to universal providence. He illuminates some of the dark problems of life that are puzzling to us all, and treats with a clear and steady pen the evolution of the Christian doctrines. The chapter that will be most interesting to those whose brethren are on the other side is entitled, "A Rational Heaven." We can but think that if a group of good people would assemble to read this book, or having read it would meet to talk over its propositions, they would find great advantage to their ethical development and spiritual life.

It is Mr. Seward's intention to visit many of our centers of population, large and small, for the purpose of explaining the brotherhood of Christian unity, and we cannot imagine a better forerunner than his book in the public, teachers' and Sunday-school library, and on the center table of the thoughtful reformer and philanthropist. We should attempt to give many passages, but that would not be fair, as the feast is a rich one and we wish to leave everybody hungry to partake. It goes without saying that Mr. Seward's attitude toward applied Christianity is broad and brotherly, and as to his feeling on the woman question we venture a few sentences:

"Among the growing forces of the new age, the widening sphere of woman must be reckoned as by no means of least importance. While her influence has always been vital and beyond the possibility of measurement, yet it has been to a large extent latent, repressed; certainly it has been exercised but rarely in its fullness. Now, as ideas are everywhere broadening, and the principles which should govern society are being better understood, the absolute need of women in every department of life is beginning to be recognized. There is a moral or spiritual side to every social question. Womanhood is peculiarly an expression or an embodiment of the moral and spiritual. Hence her influence is needed in a more direct and positive way than that of merely training her sons in the home. The problem of woman's part in the ideal social fabric is just beginning to be considered."

We have not written this notice for the sake of doing so, but in the confident belief that no forward movement can be made except as the renovation of our inmost motive and character are its basis, and we believe this book which sets forth old truths in a new light will come as the harbinger of good, especially to the more thoughtful and out-reaching minds of which this age has a larger proportion than any that has preceded it.

"H. W. S." ROUND ROBIN LETTER.*

DEAR FRIENDS:—Quite a kaleidoscope of interests has been passing before our view during the last month. Among them has been one whom you will all know about, Mrs. Hodgson Burnett, the author of "Little Lord Fauntleroy." She came down to look for a place for the summer, where she could be in quiet to write a new book she has in mind. We were all charmed with her, she was so simple and natural, and so overflowing with original fancies, and with brilliant ideas. We took her to see the rectory at the foot of our hill, a charming old-world sort of place, with most lovely gardens and grounds; and she was delighted with it and took to it at once, feeling, as she said, as if she could write almost anything in such beautiful surroundings. And then, the day after she had concluded the bargain for the place, came a cablegram from America saying that her only son, Vivian, the model for little Lord Fauntleroy, a young man now of eighteen, was ill with typhoid fever in Washington. The news was terrible to her, for she has never recovered from the death of her other son, who passed away about five years ago. Of course she had to throw up her bargain for the rectory here, and drop everything to sail for America at once.

Another of our visitors has been an authoress whose nom de plume is "Vernon Lee," but whose real name is Violet Paget. She and Logan hold exactly opposite views in literature, and our dinner table every night was a lively scene of discussion between the rival litterateurs. Logan is a disciple of Walter Pater's, an English author who has just died, and who is, I believe, considered to be the master of English style, or to speak more correctly, form in writing. Vernon Lee thinks matter is everything and form nothing; Logan thinks the form in which a thing is said adds one hundredfold to its value, and it was most entertaining to hear the two discussing the subject backwards and forwards.

Another visitor was Zangville, an author who has risen into very rapid prominence by two or three most successful books about the Jews. One of them is called "The Children of the Ghetto," and is an exceedingly vivid picture of the life of the Jews in Whitechapel.

Our place is looking most lovely. The house is literally covered with creepers, ivies, Virginia creepers, ampelopsis, roses, traveler's joy and jessamines, and great masses of the deep purple bloom of the jacksmanii clematis. We have just had a new attraction added—a lovely sundial that stands in a little green recess cut back into the woods, in a lonely place where no sign of the house is visible. This dial has been made by a most fascinating young American sculptress who is studying in Paris, and who is an artist of great promise, so all good judges say. She is as simple-hearted as a child, and indeed is not much more than a child yet, being only twenty-two; but has supported herself by her art since she was fourteen. Her name is Edith Woodman Burroughs, and you will probably hear of her some day. She is married to a painter as unworldly and simple-hearted as herself, and they are spending this summer in a little out-of-the-way French seaside village. She is with us now, having come over from France to set her sundial up in its place, and we are all charmed with her.

In the outside world things are a little more quiet for us during these summer months, as everything almost is taking a holiday. Even our temperance work is slacking up a little, and we are not to have any committee meetings for a whole month! One matter of interest in our work has however taken place since I wrote, and that is the visit to Mr. Asquith, who received our deputation most cordially, and said he had no hesitation in declaring that he was in entire sympathy and always had been with the object of the deputation. He felt that the custody and supervision of women arrested on criminal charges, and awaiting their trial, should be in the hands of women for many obvious reasons. And he assured the deputation that he would give the subject his most careful consideration, and that he entertained the confident hope that as the result of the agitation some means would be devised by which the desired object could be accomplished. No doubt you all know how successful this system has been in America; and now we greatly hope we shall have it here, since our home secretary is so favorable to it. It is a great satisfaction to know that it was a W. C. T. U. woman who originated this most essential reform, Mrs. Barney, of Rhode Island.

I wonder if there is anything else as vital as this reform to which we are still blind? The Socialists say there are many things, notably the housing of the poor and the unsanitary conditions of labor and the merciless sweating of the laboring classes; and I would include in the list the disenfranchisement of women. However, as regards all these questions, there is a tremendous awakening going on, and I imagine it is only a question of time when great changes shall take place. It seems likely to come on the line of municipalization of most, if not all of the common necessities of human life. That is, that as at present here the postal and telegraph system are the work of the state, so will the railroads and the water supply and the housing of the poor and the great branches of mining and of manufacture cease to be left private agencies, and become municipal enterprises. And some far-reaching Socialist will predict that cooking and dressing will share the same fate, and we shall obtain our food and clothes by a system of taxation, as at present we obtain our letters and our street lighting and the paving of our streets. For any one interested in the subject I append a page about the working of the system in Glasgow, where it is making a great success, and is advancing by rapid strides.

It is amazing to note the express speed at which these ideas are traveling. When Edward Bellamy's "Looking Backward" came out a few years ago people asked themselves almost with bated breath, what he meant. Now everybody accepts these ideas as foregone conclusions, and only wonder how they are to be made practical. I see in it all the gradual fulfilling of the early Christian ideal as shown in Acts 2:44–47, when they had "all things in common," and the answer to our Lord's Prayer that we "all might be one." It is beautiful to see the wonderful evolution of Christian nations (so called) on the lines of teaching of Christ even when they are unconscious of His influence, and are even, it may be, in antagonism to Him. He draws all men to Him, in spite of themselves, and often even without their consciousness. Faber says in one of his poems that God can afford to play what looks at present like a losing game, because He knows the victory is sure to come, and to come often along the very lines of the apparent defeats. For my part, spite of the sad and discouraging look of things, I feel like singing always with Pippa in Browning's "Pippa Passes"—

"God's in His heaven; all's right with the world."

*The letter has been unavoidably delayed, but is too interesting to omit publishing.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

And he said, I will hide my face from them, I will see what their end shall be for they are a very froward generation, children in whom there is no faith. O that they were wise, that they understood this, that they would consider their latter end! How should one chase a thousand and two put ten thousand to flight?—Deut. 32:20, 29, 30.

Mr. J. B. Hobbs has come out again in his regular annual tirade against the Temple. No doubt, as on former occasions, he will buy up a large issue of the paper in which his letter appears and send it broadcast over the land to our white-ribboners in order to frighten and stampede the delegates who attend the National Convention at Cleveland this week. Let not our women be alarmed at this modern Sanballat; his malice and misrepresentation will fail just as surely as did the Samaritan's. One has undertaken our cause who is mighty to deliver. Let us go forward with the work after the manner of brave Nehemiah—on our guard and with faith and prayers. Then what we have undertaken will as surely be completed with success as was Nehemiah.

One of Chicago's great journals, the Evening Post, a paper that always stands for what is just and true, comes out in a two column article in regard to Mr. Hobbs' persistent persecution of the Temple enterprise. We would like to print the entire article but it is too long.

During the past two weeks contributions for the Temple fund have been coming in more as they did before the financial panic of a year and a half ago swept over the country. A great many are sending the $3.65 required for a souvenir spoon. Mrs. M. J. Maynard, of Tullahoma, Tenn., says: "I received the spoon all right. It is lovely and I am delighted with it." Mrs. Fanny F. Wood, of Baraboo, Wis., writes that she will keep the spoon as one of her dearest treasures. She further says: "I love to look at it and feel that I have had the privilege of doing a little for the great and noble work you are engaged in." We believe all who send their contributions either great or small, feel just as this dear woman does, that it is a privilege (Mr. Hobbs to the contrary notwithstanding). The Central W. C. T. U., of Nashville, Tenn., sends $25. By the will of our beloved and lamented Mary Allen West, the Temple is the richer by four shares of W. T. P. A. stock, or $100. Mr. Thomas E. Packer, of Mystic, Conn., sends $30 on a $100 pledge.

The Carondelet Auxiliary W. C. T. U. of South St. Louis, Mo., sends $10. The Hannibal Auxiliary W. C. T. U., Mo., sends $5 on their $100 pledge. The W. C. T. U. of Ennis, Tex., send $5. Mrs. A. G. Winship has paid $65 on tablet for the Providence, R. I., fire department. She writes that the balance will be paid very soon.

Mrs. Jane R. Hawley, Bristol, Conn., writes: "Enclosed find $4, contents of my mite-box received last January. I am very anxious to get the souvenir spoon in exchange. How I wish I could do a great deal for that Temple debt. I shall always be glad I visited the Temple and went to the very top of it, and attended the noon meeting in beautiful Willard Hall; that memory will often cheer my lonely hours." The W. C. T. U. of Norfolk, Neb., sends $5 on its pledge. The W. C. T. U. of Charlotte, Mich., sends $10, completing its $100 pledge. Mrs. Curtis, the secretary, writes that they hope to still "press on with a Baby Band and some mite-boxes, and in various ways to help secure the Temple as our very own." The Central W. C. T. U. of Columbus, O., sends $38.60, completing its $100 pledge. The union at Eaton Rapids, Mich., sends $15 on the $100 the members are trying to raise. Mrs. Huldah W. Nye, of Hudson, Wis., is getting up a Baby Band, and sends $3 toward the full list. This is such a beautiful work that we wish at least one member of each union would undertake to get up a band. For a full band of one hundred names you will be entitled to a large photo-gravure of the Temple or to one of our beautiful souvenir spoons.

Mrs. A. M. P. Moore, Philadelphia, Pa., sends $12 from the F. E. Willard W. C. T. U. on their pledge of $100. Mrs. Moore writes: "Our union has the Temple very much at heart, but, like very many others, are much hindered by business finances. We will endeavor to send more money soon." Wrightstown, Pa., W. C. T. U. send $20 on their pledge. Mrs. Mary Halliday sends $5 on the pledge of the W. C. T. U. of White Sulphur Springs, Mont. She writes: "Our payment is small but our faith is strong." The Concord, N. H., union sends a second installment of $15 on their pledge. A new and small union made up of working people at Sanderstown, R. I., sends $2. Mrs. I. L. Irwin sends $25 for the Jacksonville, Fla., W. C. T. U. She concludes her letter by saying, "May every union in the state be able to do something for this noble cause."

All persons sending $1 to the Temple will receive the beautiful Columbian souvenir. Any individual who sends the contents of a mite-box, amounting to $3.65, by January 1, 1895, will receive a solid silver Temple souvenir tea-spoon. This, however, does not apply to persons filling boxes for unions; they receive the Columbian souvenir. All money orders and checks should be made out in the name of William D. Preston, and sent to our financial secretary, Miss Sara G. Johnson, the Temple, Chicago, Ill. All other matters pertaining to the Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, the Temple, Chicago, Ill.

THAT THINGS ARE NO WORSE, SIRE.

BY HELEN HUNT JACKSON.

From the time of our old revolution,
When we threw off the yoke of the king,
Has descended this phrase to remember,
To remember, to say, and to sing:
'Tis a phrase that is full of a lesson,
It can comfort and warm like a fire,
It can cheer us when days are the darkest!
"That things are no worse, O my sire."

'Twas King George's prime minister said it,
To the king, who had questioned in heat
What he meant by appointing Thanksgiving,
In such days of ill luck and defeat;
"What's the cause of your day of Thanksgiving?
Tell me, pray," cried the king in his ire;
Said the minister, "This is the reason—
That things are no worse, O my sire."

There has nothing come down in the story
Of the answer returned by the king;
But I think on his throne he sat silent,
And confessed it a sensible thing;
For there's never a burden so heavy
That it might not be heavier still;
There is never so bitter a sorrow,
That the cup could not fuller fill.

And what of care and of sadness
Our life and our duties may bring,
There is always the cause for Thanksgiving
Which the minister told to the king.
'Tis a lesson to sing and remember;
It can comfort and warm like a fire,
Can cheer us when days are the darkest,
"That things are no worse, O my sire."

SCHEMES AND A THANKSGIVING.

BY ADA M. MELVILLE.

"We had better shake hands and go; it breaks my heart, but there's nothing else left."

"If I had money, I'd make an impression!"

The speakers were Mrs. Laddon, president of the local W. C. T. U., and Carol Osborne, the bright young secretary.

"You young folks talk and dream, but older heads know. We've hung on in the face of opposition but now it is time to quit."

It was "Aunt Milly" who spoke last, the only remaining member of the union aside from the officers named, and the discussion was in reference, not to a motion to adjourn, but to disband.

The three shook hands and Mrs. Laddon went sadly away leaving the secretary to chat with Aunt Milly.

"If some of the rich people would patronize our W. C. T. U. as they do the milliner stores, my schemes alone—carried out—would set the town on fire;" this from Carol.

"Bless your brave heart! Perhaps the way will open before you some day. But we haven't money and we haven't members. We've sacrificed everything we can and failed; now we'll quit."

"Saloons won't quit! And men—good men—"

Carol's voice was tearful and Aunt Milly knew silence was better than words just then.

Among the "good men" was one who had been a friend of Carol's, and Mrs. Grundy had whispered about a possible tenderer relation.

This Aunt Milly—so-called by all who knew her—was an unmarried woman possessed of means; i. e., a home where she lived with her domestic and a bank account sufficient to supply her simple needs.

Besides these, she owned a corner lot to the possession of which she clung with odd tenacity. Her brother wished to purchase and offered her her own price. But she had had a private difference with this same brother and her pride kept her lips from speaking the words of consent to sell. Her brother was mayor of the city and it was on the liquor question the difference had been.

After Aunt Milly had settled down in the quiet of her room that night, her own words recurred to her mind,—"we've sacrificed everything we can." They haunted her until in a quaint way peculiar to herself she said aloud, "Well, let's have it out then,—'we've sacrificed everything we can.' Haven't I, for one? I didn't go gadding this summer, I gave up coffee and I've worn my best silk so many years, even the mayor ought to disown me. As for —ah!"

The ejaculation was more of a shiver than an utterance. She sat silent then until the fire in the grate went out and every sound in the street had died away. When at last she moved to retire, her face was a trifle pale, but there was a daring light in her eyes.

Weeks passed. It lacked but a month of Thanksgiving.

"Temperance seems to be on top here," said a traveling man who was passing through Seabright.

"It will be if them temperance women go on. Lectures by big guns every week, Gospel meetings every night—they say the mayor goes to some!—and the coffee cart scheme. Beats me where the money comes from. There wa'n't but three members in the W. C. T. U. a bit ago; now they have a bank account and are running the town. It hasn't hurt my business none and they may go ahead for all me." (The speaker was a butcher.)

One week to Thanksgiving. A novel scene was being enacted in Seabright. Opposite each of the three saloons in the city was a house on wheels, through whose open door came whiffs more fragrant than issued from the saloons. These wheeled houses were improved and enlarged lunch-wagons, each presided over by a young woman assisted by an "honorary." The legends on the wagons read thus: COFFEE, HOT,—THREE CENTS. TWO SANDWICHES GIVEN AWAY WITH EVERY DRINK.

Saloon customers were courteously waylaid and if possible deterred from their intended visit, by gifts of unlimited coffee when all else failed.

In one of these coffee establishments Carol presided as inside waitress. Her "honorary" helper thought she seemed nervous in the watch she kept on the saloon door. One afternoon she startled him by a sudden exclamation.

"What's the matter, Miss Osborne?"

"That—that gentleman—stop him—don't let him get in!"

"That? Why, that's Torrence Jackson. Oh, Torr! Stop a minute, will you?"

"What is it?" gruffly asked the other halting on the saloon step.

"Miss Osborne wants you."

"Miss Osborne—wants me?"

Passers-by turned in surprise to see a young girl standing in the storm of snow and wind, pleading with the young man who stood shamefaced before her. But no one heard what passed, they only saw that the gentleman turned and went the way he had come.

Thanksgiving day. The largest hall in town was not large enough to hold the people who poured in. Flaming posters through the streets had announced, "Every saloon in Seabright closed up. Come and rejoice with the Woman's Christian Temperance Union."

The news was true. The three saloon-keepers had closed out and temperance sentiment was too unanimous to make it safe for would-be successors. Enthusiasm in the called meeting of rejoicing waxed high and higher. The mayor sat among the speakers but the majority thought it was just a dumb show to placate his temperance sister. But he had a speech to make and it called forth such cheers as a Seabright audience had never before delivered themselves of. His closing words were:

"Office or no office—wealth or poverty—popularity or enmity—I shall never by voice or vote do otherwise than outlaw the saloon by every means at my command."

"Oh, Aunt Milly! Now I know where the money came from. You sold the mayor your lot? What a sacrifice!"

"Fudge; I thought I'd sacrificed everything and I hadn't begun to. What did I need of that lot compared to souls needing salvation and the Lord needing my help and my money? Yes, the mayor offered me my own terms. I shut him up in my parlor one day and made them. They wer'n't just what he expected. 'Cash down' he didn't mind, but I stipulated that he attend at least one gospel meeting a week and that no matter what the W. C. T. U. did he'd wink at it for a change, seeing he'd winked at saloons so long. I had a tussle with him but you heard what he said awhile ago!"

"Yes; and the best of all—no, not the best—but my best—you know what I mean—this Thanksgiving—"

"Sure, child. Torrence will make a good man and you were brave. But see here—has it never occurred to you that our little secretary started all this? Don't you remember what you said? 'My schemes would set the town afire!' My money only carried out your schemes. It's your Thanksgiving."

AN UNFINISHED SERMON.

BY PROF. DAVID SWING.

[Perhaps one of the most pathetic of the many touching incidents relative to the decease of Prof. David Swing, of Chicago, was the reading in his church shortly after his death, from the incompleted manuscript, the last sermon written by this eminent preacher. The subject was, "The Redemption of a City," the text being, "Who redeemeth thy life from destruction," Psalm 103: 4. Extracts from this sermon are given below.—EDS.]

"The word redemption sprang up when men first began to fight and take prisoners on land and sea. To kill these prisoners was not always the best manner in which to dispose of them. Perhaps rich families would pay much money or many camels or kids for their release. From such a source the word soon passed to a spiritual meaning, and we hear Job saying: 'I know that my Redeemer liveth; he will at last appear and buy me back from my cruel captors'; we hear the psalm singing of the kind God who buys us away from destruction. Thus step by step came the thought and sentiment that named Christ the Redeemer."

"May great success come to the Civic Federation, which is attempting to redeem this city from the grasp of those men in office and out of office, who, being Romanists, disgrace Rome's altar, or, being Protestants, disgrace all humanity! Nothing is so beautiful as the face of the Redeemer, but each man and woman who leads toward a higher life is a redeemer of our race. Christ was a fountain of redemption, but humanity at large composes the great flood. Each noble soul, each good book, each great picture, each piece of high music is a redeemer, and when the soul, young or mature, has once started toward its salvation, then each field, each forest, becomes a page in its divine book, and each bird song a revival hymn sweet as those of the old Methodists."

"In our age there is a vast multitude of employers who pay something to a man because he is a human being. An element undreamed of by the last century enters into the wages of to-day. Mr. Childs did not regard the law of demand and supply. His heart made some new law, and he paid as much to the human being as he did to the trade of the man. He could have secured labor at a low market price, but he hated the calculations of the last century and paid men what pleased his own benevolence. Few of you make any effort to secure help at the lowest rates. The human being, man, woman or boy, steps in and draws a few additional pennies. The sweatshops are places where love has not yet come. There the law of demand and supply works in all its old-time barbarity."

. . . . . .

"There may be defects in the Pullman case, but, viewed from a hundred gambling dens and a thousand saloons, it looks well. Seen from our city hall it looks like a group of palm trees waving over a spring in the desert. While traveling through hell Dante was cheered when, looking through pitchy clouds, he saw a star. We are not to assume that the town of Pullman has reached its greatest excellence. It is injured by the unrest of the nation. Perhaps many of our employers will, like Mr. Brassy, of England, decline to accept of us profits beyond five per cent. We must all hope much from the gradual progress of brotherly love—"

WOMEN IN PUBLIC AFFAIRS.

William Dean Howells has allowed the following utterances of his through the public press to place him on record as the friend of woman's cause, especially as touching her part—or desired part—in public affairs:

"I am glad to see women enter into public life in any way. As for this particular matter (the franchise) I could not give an opinion of it, as I have not given it any consideration. I should think that any opinions I should have in regard to woman suffrage would apply, so far as I know, to this. Women, I believe, are naturally serious-minded. It would be a good thing for a woman's character and a good thing for public affairs if she were interested in them. I think it would purify public life. The average woman is better than the average man. A woman is not tempted by money, generally. That is one of the evils of public life. A woman could not be bought. Men, and not the women, are the breadwinners. There is altogether too much talk about the inborn differences of men and women. Novelists have been apt to make too much distinction between their characters. At first, in the home, there is no difference between the boy and the girl. Why should not the girl inherit the father's traits of character as well as the mother's? The differences are chiefly owing to habit and environment. A woman is better for the interest she takes in politics, and politics is better for her consideration of it."

A Thanksgiving Story.

BY EMMA PLAYTER SEABURY.

They were trundling home the washing,
To the mansion on the hill,
In a little broken wagon,
Marie and brother Will.
And she steadied the great basket,
Lest anything should spill
Till her head grew faint and dizzy.
Cold blew the winds and chill.

They knew it was Thanksgiving,
But alike were all their days,
They must toil and help poor mother
And only snatch their plays;
But it had not been so always,
When their father, best of men,
Was with them, but he went away,
And ne'er came back again.

They stood outside the gateway.
How each little heart did beat,
As carriage after carriage
Went rolling down the street;
And the little lads and lasses,
All dressed in raiment fine,
Tripped o'er the broad verandahs
To the splendid hall to dine.

"My mother has no holidays,
In many, many years,
How beautiful to be so rich,"
She said mid blinding tears.
"Be thankful God is good to you,
Sweet lady." In a fright,
She seized her little brother,
And rushed forth into the night.

For a moment gentle Edith
Stood bewildered and amazed,
Her bosom heaved with smothered sobs,
Her lily forehead blazed;
"Bring out the coach," she ordered,
"My cloak, too, right away;
They, too, shall have Thanksgiving,
In my father's house to-day."

She found them in their cabin,
Their hearts were sore and sad,
She said, "Come, cease your weeping,
I've come to make you glad.
I've brought Marie some dresses,
For Will, a suit, you see,
Some wraps for your dear mother,
You're all to go with me."

'Twas like a dream of fairyland,
The feast before them spread,
The light, and warmth, and music,
The children laughing said.
She whirled them home at midnight,
In the raging of the storm

The Squire had one daughter,
A lovely, winsome thing,
With soft blue eyes and floating hair,
A bird upon the wing.
A fair and fragile flower
Whose wish, however small,
Was law unto the servants,
And the master of the hall.

She saw the children standing,
Outside the gate awhile,
Afraid to ring the great door bell,
Awed with the rank and style
Of the merry little party,
Who laughed and danced that night,
To the strains of joyous music,
And the gleaming blaze of light.

She stole round to the kitchen,
And left the dance and play,
"Why, children, 'tis Thanksgiving,
Why bring the wash to-day?"
With just a touch of bitterness,
Marie her arms did fold,
"We've nothing to be thankful for,
Except we're poor and cold.

But a light was in the window,
There was food, and it was warm.

And a man was on the threshold,
And opened wide the door,
"I've come for you, my darlings,
And I will roam no more."
Oh, it was a glad Thanksgiving,
They were humbly thankful; yet,
As they knelt, Marie said softly,
"God never does forget."

Monticello, Cal.

Four little chestnuts
Swinging, swinging high;
In their silk-lined cradle house
Snug and warm they lie.
Now the air grows chilly—
Ha! here's Frosty Jack,
Quick he spies the cradle-house,
Gives a merry thwack!
Out the chestnuts tumble,
Down to earth they slide—
One for you and one for me
And two for Baby Clyde!

—Selected.

Dear Boys and Girls:—Did you ever try to realize (and that means to make real) the first Thanksgiving? Let us try it now. Just shut your eyes, each one and let us think of how it came about and what it all really means.

First we can picture to ourselves the good, brave people who left their homes and sailed away for an unknown land because they were not permitted to worship God as their consciences dictated. They were honest, just and true, and as we think of the people of that sort around about us nowadays, we know exactly how they looked and acted.

But how did they live? That is not so easy for the city Cornerers, who have never seen a log hut, to understand. But our children in the country will know, although they can hardly realize the hard times endured by the early settlers on the New England coast. It is all told in our United States histories and by many children's writers. With aid from the friendly Indians, and houses roughly hewed out of logs, they had lived through their first year, and with what we would think very little to be thankful for, their hearts turned with prayers of gratitude to God for being so good to them.

We are told that the first Thanksgiving dinner was served out of doors. Can you call to your mind the strange scene? The plainly dressed women cooking, the children eager and interested, the Indian friends in their strange clothes and ornaments, the great limitless ocean stretching out to the east, the minister lifting his voice in prayer? They had often been cold and hungry and many of the little colony had died—but their trust and faith were none the less—and so it should be with us.

As you picture these sights "in your mind's eye" does it not make you thankful that you have been born in these days of comfort and ease? And will you not show your thankfulness by setting apart some of the good things—some of the things which are yours in such abundance—to give to those who will have so little on Thanksgiving day?

Some of our Cornerers who read these lines will think they have very little to be thankful for, perhaps. The hard times may prevent many from having even the plainest Thanksgiving dinner. Some dear cousin or nearer relative may be far away and so a disappointment mars the pleasure of the day. But thinking of those first Thanksgiving days and what they really meant, in the spirit of thankfulness which makes us count our blessings and overcomes all sorrow and disappointment, we will rejoice and be glad on this festal day, knowing that our Heavenly Father wants us to do so for others' sake as well as our own.

Affectionately,

Aunt Jane

CAUSES FOR THANKSGIVING.

Our national Thanksgiving day finds us with a realizing sense that the past year has been one of undoubted growth along all upward lines, and that as a nation, as temperance workers and as individuals, we have abundant reason to "come before His presence with thanksgiving."

We note first some of our many causes for thankfulness as a nation. It is true that we have had serious domestic disturbances; that events have revealed a dangerous lack of unity between the two great arms of national prosperity, causing a tidal wave of poverty and distress to sweep over the land, and that even now many of our commercial interests are still struggling to keep above water; but despite these and other seemingly discouraging facts—indeed, perhaps largely because of them—we as a nation have more reason to thank God and take courage than ever before.

We have had the great strike and the riots growing out of it, but we have had no devastating war like China and Japan, and we may count as one of our causes for thanksgiving the fact that these events have furnished wonderful stimulus to the arbitration idea as applied to the adjustment of all difficulties between man and man.

We have reason to be thankful that the lesson of the past year was not presented in harsher form, and more than all is it a matter for rejoicing that people generally are learning their lesson. The recently published report of the government strike commission is an encouraging indication of a readiness on the part of the people to think on these things and to profit by the occurrences of the year. It recommends among other things a permanent national strike commission and the adoption by states of some system of conciliation and arbitration.

We would mention also as matters for national thanksgiving the work of the Dr. Parkhurst organization in New York and that of the Civic Federation in Chicago. These two movements, centering as they do in the two largest cities are, we believe, destined to be among the most powerful influences for good throughout this land that modern times have known.

Second, some of the causes for thankfulness we have as temperance workers. The record for the year in this line shows a marked advance in prohibition thought. Resolutions of influential bodies against the liquor traffic have waxed stronger and bolder; legislative action in various states—Iowa not excepted—has been such as to strengthen the cause of party Prohibition; while in mass-meetings and other public demonstrations, people of all classes have declared their hatred of the drink business with its kindred evils and their adhesion to prohibition principles in a manner ofttimes unique, always vigorous and stimulating.

And last but by no means least of the causes for special thanksgiving on the part of temperance people generally and the W. C. T. U. particularly is the improved health of our beloved Chieftain, which enables her to return to her own country and once more take up the work she loves so well and which so needs her wise leadership and "inner vision." We feel sure that no white-ribboner as she joins in the pæans of praise on Thanksgiving day, will fail to give thanks to God from the depths of her heart for this manifestation of His loving kindness.

Third, we have occasion to offer thanksgiving to the Giver of all good, as individuals. As "every heart knoweth its own bitterness" so also every heart knoweth its own joy. Each person knows the special spiritual or material blessings of which he or she has been the recipient. But the highest joy, the happiest thanksgiving, belongs to those who have helped others, who have received in giving. Not necessarily money, for the giving of silver and gold does not always constitute true helpfulness, and each individual must judge for himself both as to the matter and the manner of giving, remembering that

"Who gives himself with his alms feeds three, Himself, his hungry neighbor and Me."

Doubtless there are many among the poverty stricken, the oppressed and the heavy laden, who think they have very little to be thankful for, and our heart goes out to such all over this broad land. But there is one thing every man, woman and child may thank God for now and always, and that is for His "unspeakable gift"—for Christ the great burden-bearer, the wonderful rest-giver. And if there be any rich or poor, who have not proved its value, it is not the fault either of the gift or the giver. In all the turmoil and strife of these latter days (which is but "the struggle of men to the heights above") we become more and more impressed with the necessity of revealing Christ to the people—of opening the eyes of the individual and of the nation to the "one thing needful." "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and all these things shall be added unto you." These things that the people are clamoring for—food, clothing, shelter, everything that brings comfort and happiness in "the life that now is as well as that which is to come." Let us thank God that those who seek diligently shall find.

SHALL THERE BE A NEW PARTY?

Our symposium for this week's issue answers, from varying standpoints, this question. One point, as brought out in these answers, is especially worthy of notice, and that is that the majority of those avowing themselves in favor of any new movement, political or otherwise, which shall tend to the swift destruction of the liquor traffic, are already enrolled in the ranks of the Prohibition party.

One of the arguments which has been most frequently hurled against the "third party Prohibitionist" is that he "out-Herods Herod" in the matter of partisanship; that he is a zealot of zealots, caring so much for party lines that he would prefer to jeopardize the cause at stake rather than win victory through any other medium.

This charge, if true, would be a most serious one. All parties, all organizations, all sects in the past have lost power by just so much as they have placed organization above principle, form above life. This was the mistake of the Christian church in the middle ages; it is too widely the mistake of that church to-day. It has been the mistake of all great political parties from the beginning of history. Each one originated as an expression of some vital principle; each one had power so long as the principle dominated the form; each one sank into corruption and, later, into "innocuous desuetude," as soon as the power dominated the principle.

The Prohibition party has not as yet to contend against the dangers of success; nevertheless, the very intensity of their convictions could easily be perverted into an intolerance, if once party were allowed to take first place in the affections of its adherents.

We are especially glad, therefore, to note the fact that so many prominent Prohibitionists, while bound by ties of love and loyalty to their party as the exponent of a principle, are still ready to merge its individuality into that of another party, if the signs of the times ever indicate that such merging will serve the broader establishment and swifter ultimate victory of the principle itself.

Whether or not such occasion will ever arise, we are not competent to announce. No prophet's vision as to the modus operandi by which our great cause is to win in the swift-coming battle has been vouchsafed to us. But the air is filled with signs which betoken how rapidly the battle is drawing near.

The whole nation is moved by an unrest and an anxiety which must soon discover to itself the solution of its existence. One or two more such "political landslides" as have been witnessed within the past two years, and the people as a unit will apply the relentless logic of fact to the existing state of affairs.

When that shall be done then, as irresistibly as atom draws atom to itself in vital cohesion, the good and true of all parties and no parties shall come together in a union of plan and a union of effort through which God shall pour His might for the overthrow of the liquor traffic and the upbuilding of the kingdom.

MR. GLADSTONE AND THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

The opponents of local option on both sides of the Atlantic are deriving much satisfaction from what they regard as a change of front on the part of England's ex-Premier toward the Direct Veto Bill. Advocates of the Scandinavian system especially are rejoicing, for they expect their pet "reform" to receive a tremendous impulse forward by reason of this agitation, and indeed any utterance on legislative affairs dictated by the mature wisdom of this venerable statesman cannot fail to carry great weight with all classes. Hence it is not to be wondered at that, interpreting Mr. Gladstone's words according to the popular acceptation, temperance workers should manifest no little consternation thereat; nor that emanating from the recent official head of government and the still powerful leader among the Liberal forces, they should have produced such a bomb-like effect in the party pledged by word and deed to the support of the Veto Bill.

The letter which caused all this commotion was written in reply to a request from Lord Thring to join the Public House Reform Association (which association aims at government control of the liquor traffic), and treats of the question thus:

For many years I have been strongly of opinion that the principle of selling liquor for the public profit only offered the sole chance of escape from the present miserable and almost contemptible predicament, which is a disgrace to the country. I am friendly to local option; but it can be no more than a partial and occasional remedy. The mere limitation of numbers—the ideal of Parliament for the last twenty years—is, if pretending to the honor of a remedy, little better than an imposture. The growth of the system of tied houses continually aggravates the prevailing mischief. Of details I do not speak; but in principle you are working on the only lines either promising or tenable.

The wide publication of this extract and the use made of it by the Bishop of Chester, Mr. Chamberlain and other ardent supporters of the Gothenburg system called out a lengthy epistle from the secretary of the United Kingdom Alliance to Mr. Gladstone, the object of which is shown in these closing words:

As much disquiet and anxiety has been caused by what I deem misrepresentations of your position on this most important question, I take the great liberty of begging that you will, in some way, give to the public such a statement as will set the matter at rest.

To this Mr. Herbert Gladstone replies in part:

What Mr. Gladstone thinks of local option is, that it is a sound principle, which has every title to be pressed on Parliament, and which will be useful wherever it is adopted. But the mischief of drink is so frightful that he is not willing to trust exclusively to a remedy which he fears may not be of wide operation.

He thinks that the principle of sale under public authority is defensible, and it seems to him to be the most hopeful of the methods now attainable for producing benefit on an extended scale. He speaks, of course, according to the latest information he possesses.

This statement is surely proof positive that the previous letter has been very generally misconstrued, and that local optionists have nothing to fear from Mr. Gladstone. But while this may be the explanation, it is not likely to be the conclusion of the whole matter, for the enemy sees in the letter to Lord Thring too good a chance to bolster up a scheme for the perpetuation of the liquor traffic, and will doubtless continue to make capital out of it.

Mr. Gladstone imagined he was writing to one who fully understood his unalterable attitude toward the government bill, and hence was not so careful in his choice of words as he might have been had he known they would be proclaimed from the house-tops—that they would not only be subjected to public criticism, but used as a weapon against a measure to which he was not only "friendly," but which when prime minister he had regarded as of such "cardinal importance" as to be included in the business outline presented to Parliament in the Queen's speech.

What is it Mr. Gladstone characterizes as "little better than an imposture"? Certainly not local option, as the opponents of that measure would have us believe, for he distinctly refers to local option as a "remedy"—"partial" it is true, but still a remedy—while the imposture only pretends to that honor. It is clearly something which has been the "ideal of parliament for the last twenty years." We have yet to learn that the English parliament has been all that time looking toward the popular veto as a solution of the liquor problem. But we do know that legislative effort in that country has been until quite recently in the direction of the "mere limitation of numbers"—the restriction by the magistracy or landlords, not by the people, of licensed hotels and public houses. We know also by sad experience in our own land that regulation of the drink evil along this line, while "pretending to the honor of a remedy," is in fact no better than an imposture.

The local veto promises more than mere limitation of numbers; it includes the possibility of entire prohibition within the given area. In Mr. Gladstone's own words (uttered in 1892 on the eve of the general election), its "power extends even to the local extinction of the traffic." And it is because of this possibility only that local option has any claim to be called even a partial or occasional remedy.

The declaration that the public house reformers are "working on the only lines either promising or tenable," while fallacious doctrine from a prohibition standpoint does not necessarily rule out the direct veto. In fact, the Chester scheme includes the local option idea, as does also the much approved Gothenburg plan; and we gather from previous statements and from the whole tenor of his conduct that the ex-Premier favors both measures. He would, to quote the great temperance leader, Sir W. Lawson, give communities the option of "Gothenburg" when they have declined to avail themselves of the option of prohibition.

The "singleness and simplicity" of the government bill Mr. Gladstone regards as its most commendable feature and he is persuaded that "it would be a great and perhaps fatal mistake to hamper it by adding other propositions important in themselves, most valuable perhaps in themselves, but which would be out of place in this measure." But he is afraid to trust the people in this matter; he is "not willing to trust exclusively to a remedy which may not be of wide operation." Hence his advocacy of national or municipal control, not as a substitute for but as supplementary to local option.

This is evidently the situation as viewed by leading vetoists who "hope the friends of prohibition will not be troubled or perplexed by this latest move for the regulation of the devilish and destructive traffic."

But while contending for the consistency of Mr. Gladstone's position, we at the same time express keenest disappointment and regret at his adhesion to the unsound principle of "sale under public authority." Except that it makes drink-sellers of the public instead of private individuals, we fail to see wherein this method differs from the "mere limitation of numbers" which is little better than an imposture. To transfer the liquor business from the governed to the governors is to intrench the evil more firmly in the social and political economy of a nation, and the greater the revenue derived from the traffic the more unwilling will the people be to abolish or even restrict it. If the existing system of regulation is "a disgrace to the country," how much greater England's disgrace if she pours the ill-gotten gains of drink—"the mischief of which is so frightful"—into her own national or municipal treasuries!

Mr. Gladstone has himself declared that the traffic is "detrimental and pernicious in the highest degree to the social and moral as well as to the physical life of the community," and that it "destroys more than war, pestilence and famine combined." Will it in his opinion be rendered less pernicious and destructive by being covered with that cloak of "respectability" which government control is supposed to confer? We cannot doubt that England's "grand old man" with his broad outlook and wide experience, his great heart attuned to the realities of life and responsive to the needs of humanity, is honestly seeking for the nation he has served so faithfully, a "chance of escape from its present miserable and almost contemptible predicament," and that his motive in befriending the nationalization project is more noble than that of the Bishop of Chester, who wants to "raise the level of the drink-seller and make him less liable to discredit than he is at present."

Indeed, we find a hint of a higher ideal than that of government control in the words, "It seems to be the most hopeful of the methods now attainable." No matter what may be Mr. Gladstone's private opinion as to the right or the expediency of national prohibition in the future, this ultra-radical policy is "according to the latest information he possesses," practically unattainable in the present. If he will secure the latest and most reliable information concerning the operation of the Gothenburg plan in Norway and Sweden, he will find that wherever results are such as to commend this system to temperance reformers, it is due to its local option features—to the prohibitive, not to the regulative, principle in the law.

And we believe that if Mr. Gladstone lives and observes a few years longer he will be convinced by the logic of events that national and total prohibition is the only "sound principle" that can be applied to the liquor traffic and that though this is at present unattained in any country it is not to be considered as unattainable.

CHINA'S DOWAGER EMPRESS.

We read much in these days of the Dowager Empress of China, but the marvelous story of her life ought to be better known. It seems that she is the daughter of a poor family who lived many years ago in the outskirts of Canton. This family consisted of father, mother, a girl of fourteen and a boy of seven. When they were on the verge of starvation the girl, who was extremely beautiful, begged her father to sell her as a slave rather than that they should all perish. Very greatly against his will he finally consented, and she became the property of a distinguished General. She manifested a disposition so lovely and was so industrious and helpful, that after one year the General adopted her as his own daughter. Some years later he was called to Pekin to be decorated by the Emperor for his services, and, after carefully considering what present he could take with him, he finally decided that he would pay the Emperor the highest compliment in his power, namely, he would give him his daughter as a member of his harem; but the Emperor was so delighted with the appearance and character of the young lady who had been carefully educated in the home of the General, that he married her, and she became the mother of a later Emperor, and acquired such an overmastering influence in the councils of the Empire that to-day she is the most potent personality among the 400,000,000 people that it contains.

When she came to power, she induced her son to send an embassy charged with the duty of finding her parents and her brother. After a long and careful search they ascertained that the father and mother of the Empress were dead, and her brother a poverty-stricken laborer in a distant province. When they went to him with the tidings that his sister was none other than the great Empress dowager, he was so overwhelmed that he fell to the ground in a faint. They brought him to the palace, where every honor was paid him, and he was for the remainder of his life treated with the consideration usually bestowed upon a prince. The Empress has just reached the age of sixty years—a cycle famous to the Mongolian. The nation has long been conducting preparations to celebrate the event in her honor with twenty-five millions of money, but upon the outbreak of the present war with Japan the Empress requested that the money being set aside for this celebration be used for the purposes of the war, but nevertheless great ceremonies and wonderful displays characterized the birthday of the beloved Empress who, forty-six years ago, was sold as a slave girl by a starving father. "She found China," in the words of an eminent writer, "with the prestige, resources and peace of the realm reduced to their lowest ebb, with the most fruitful provinces a desert; with three great and apparently successful rebellions raging simultaneously in different parts of the Empire; with a load of debt caused by an unsuccessful foreign war, during which the capital was in the hands of the invader." She found all these when her husband died in 1861; her son was then seven years old, and she became regent, and when she handed over the reins of government to him in 1889, profound peace reigned over the eighteen provinces and the vast regions outside them, and there never was a time in the history of China when the country was greater in the eyes of foreign powers, or more respected by them, than during the reign of this great statesman woman, the Empress dowager. Her voice is still for peace, but it looks as if counsels less wise were to prevail. It is a part of the universal development of women in all countries that the greatest Empire on the face of the earth should, in this day, have developed the greatest woman sovereign who has ever reigned.

THE Columbian Ambulance Association is the name of an organization which purposes to train ambulance men, patrolmen, policemen and firemen of the city of Chicago in some of the elementary principles of handling and caring for the injured and sick to whose aid they may be called. Injury by fire or falls, wounds causing artery bleeding and other emergency cases often end in death when prompt and intelligent service might avoid the fatality. These training classes will, without a doubt, be gladly attended and the purses of the public of Chicago readily opened to reimburse the association. Dr. H. W. Gentiles, 153 Fifty-third street, will furnish more information to those who desire it.

"A long pull, and a strong pull, and a pull all together," solves many a weighty problem before which men have stood, as individuals, less than a wisp of straw in strength. But when the wisps were combined they formed a cable, and the mighty obstacle became, under its inducements, a feather's weight. The hills are often steep, sometimes the sun beats down and the road is dusty. Sometimes the storm rages and we can hardly keep our hold. Opposition brickbats are flying. In unity only is safety. He who loses his hold, and would let the others carry him is apt to get left behind or trampled under foot. A pull all together. Not a pull here and a jerk there. All together. Every hand is needed until valleys drop out of sight, clouds lie beneath our feet, mountain crags are surmounted and we see the land of promise where the Sun of Righteousness knows no going down.

An incident both amusing and wrath-provoking is the recent refusal of the orators of Harvard University to debate with those of Boston University because a woman was among the number chosen to represent the latter. Boston University having been founded on the principle of co-education in all its departments, and standing as one of the most conspicuous props of the benefits to be derived therefrom, it was to have been expected that the young men would refuse the contest unless their co-adjutor was permitted her place. But alas! after "great indignation" the Boston male contestants "surrendered unconditionally" and the debate took place November 15. No young men ever had a nobler opportunity to set themselves on record for justice and right. It is to be regretted, for the sake of the University as well as for themselves individually, that they so signally failed. It is they who have been defeated, not the young lady, Miss Cornell, whose powers of oratory the Harvard boys feared, will doubtless gain for her other and larger audiences. But that the university which stands for progress should have gone down before the one which represents the caste and customs of a century ago is to be sincerely deplored.

According to the United States census, 2,647,157 women are wage workers. These are census statistics. But where are the data which will tell of the work of the other millions of wives and mothers whose never-ending labors keep the gear running in the homes that make the nation? The husband and father brings the wage of his eight or ten hours' work and bestows as alms that which his other half has more than earned in making home cheerful and in ministering to the wants of the family in season and out of season. But the advancing times are doing much to arouse men's appreciation of the "woman wage-workers" at the family hearth, where more often will occur an equal division of the earnings and fainter will grow the echo of the humiliating query, "What did you do with the last half dollar I gave you?" Then census figures will be mighty and meaningful.

I saw a baby taking some life-lessons the other day at its mother's hands. The mother had a pretty picture card which she did not want the grasping fingers to spoil so she held the gay colors just out of reach, tapping the dimpled fist teasingly, holding the card within reach, snatching it away, all the while talking charmingly to the little creature. It was play for baby for a minute or two, then it grew serious and a determined purpose grew in baby's mind to have that card. Still the mother teased. Baby grew fretful. Then it was allowed to touch the card only to have it snatched away as before. The child's face was a study in the way it would look into mother's smiling face, glances of growing distrust and suspicion. One could almost fancy that it thought, "I believe she's doing it on purpose, so I'll just yell—I will!" And yell the good-natured little thing did. Result! Possession of the card for a full minute, accompanied by a smile of triumph, almost of cunning. Card snatched away. Instantaneous shriek, card as instantly thrust into its fingers for perhaps two minutes. So the process went on until the child had torn the card up and cried itself into a fever, yet when the mother began to tease it the little thing was happily looking out of the car window with no thought fretfulness. I thought it possible the foolish mother would follow up her foolishness by a dose of "soothing syrup" when she got home, and wonder why her baby wasn't good like other babies? ON DUTY.

COLORADO'S CONVENTION.

Once more the president's gavel has dropped and reverent voices have sung the parting hymn, "God be with you till we meet again," and our two hundred delegates have strapped their "telescopes" and waved "good-bye" from the car platforms, for we are just at the close of one of the grandest conventions that has ever met to disseminate its knowledge and influence in our free state by our free "citizens."

On the morning of October 17, the doors of the First Baptist church in Denver were thrown hospitably open to receive the fifteenth annual convention of the W. C. T. U. of Colorado. The church was beautifully decorated.

The convention opened with a consecration service conducted by Rev. Ella F. Leonard. The subject was, "Sunshine, the Need of it in the Natural and Spiritual World." At the opening of the business session of the convention, Mrs. Lillian Cole Bethel, of Columbus, O., was appointed our parliamentarian. Rev. C. B. Allen, of Denver, was introduced, and in speaking of a man opposed to woman's ballot he quoted his argument thus: "Woman, God bless her; once our superior now our equal."

Among the many interesting reports was one on state and county fairs, in which the superintendent advised permanent headquarters on State Fair grounds, also that we should bring our work before our rural brothers in their large gatherings, such as Potato Day, Peach Day, and Fruit Day, and that we should always begin our preparations in season; that we should work for a law refusing liquor dealers the right to sell liquor on the grounds, also a law to have saloons closed on these days.

The report from the press department showed the papers of Colorado very kind to us all over the state, often inserting items without charge.

Medal contest work has been gaining ground and is quite generally taken up, it being conceded that these contests are not only remunerative, but that they do much good in making temperance sentiment; from fifteen to seventeen is thought to be the best age for contestants, although some very unique contests have been held called "Married Women's Contests" and "Married Men's Contests." Our president very wittily suggested following these with an "Old Maids' and Old Bachelors' Contest."

The good reports on foreign literature and railroad work by our veteran superintendents, Mrs. J. A. Temple and Mrs. N. A. McGahey, were accepted by rising vote.

The report of the Temple showed the work at a standstill on the account of the hard times, but when Mrs. Higgins gave the record of Mrs. Carse's work and her heroic efforts for money raising, the house rang with applause, and each union felt encouraged to renew their efforts the coming year.

The report on scientific temperance instruction shows great advancement made—the law is generally enforced; cigarette smoking is perceptibly on the decrease throughout the state.

A very telling address on "Good Citizenship" was given by Mrs. M. J. Borden, of New Mexico. She said she "was glad to address this second free state of the Union, felt that the design and essence of all law is justice, its highest aim to protect the people, but the people are the government, hence directly responsible for the weal or woe of the people. A business that menaces the individual is a business that menaces the government."

The evening meeting was given to addresses of welcome, music, and the annual address of our president. In this address the whole state work was handled in a very masterly way and we felt that the large audience which listened so attentively to her words must have been convinced of the righteousness of our cause.

The second day was filled with reports of the work and a part of the morning hour given to memorial service for Mrs. C. D. H. Thompson, a former state president, and Miss Margaret Craise, both beloved workers.

Legislative and petition work brought out the fact that we haven't stopped praying because we are trying to enforce the law. An incident in point occurred in a fine saloon where a white-ribboner was told by the saloon-keeper to go home and tend to her own affairs, proved that she obeyed him by having him arrested, for which he left town, saying he "wouldn't stay in a place run by women."

The report of the juvenile superintendent shows the little people hard at work, eighteen new Legions having been added to the number. "The children's hour" was one of great interest, Legions from all over the city being marshalled together by their faithful leaders to take part with songs and recitations. A chalk talk was given by the state superintendent.

The address of the evening was given by Mrs. Caroline Woodward, of Nebraska, on "The Issue of the Hour." Her points were well taken and her words full of convincing power, as was attested by the attention and applause of the audience.

The last day of the convention was Scripture measure, "pressed down and running over," as last convention days always are, but the over pressure bore fruits in a motion to add one more day to the convention number, so that our host of 1895 will have the pleasure of entertaining us four whole days, instead of three.

Among the many important resolutions adopted was one presented by the Equal Suffrage Association in regard to the initiative and referendum, also the age of consent. Mrs. Matteson, in presenting these resolutions, said: "Women of Colorado, let us band together, and let us have purer laws for the government of our children."

The hearty sympathy of the pulpit was proven by the many good words from the ministers of the city, who gave their presence and influence. The Rev. Kerr B. Tupper, when introduced, said: "I am sometimes asked how I shall vote, but the very fact that I am a Christian man ought to show where I stand, by my influence, my words and my vote, and I am glad that we men of Colorado have at last had sense enough to place along beside ourselves, women!" Mr. John Hipp was present, and gave many stirring words for prohibition.

The secretary's report shows the work in good condition all over the state, and in spite of the hard times a large increase of membership. The treasurer also encouraged us with a fine report, showing that we stand in a much better position than for years, notwithstanding financial depression. Cottage and Crittenton Homes have both been doing noble work in sheltering and caring for our suffering sisters. Mrs. Beech, who is called the "mother" of the Cottage Home, as it was through her efforts it was established, brought farewell greeting to the Convention, as she now leaves our state for her home in Iowa.

Two of the principal addresses were those of Hon. George W. Richardson, Prohibition nominee for Governor, and Prof. A. B. Copeland, nominee for state superintendent of public instruction; both were enthusiastically received, the teachers of the city turning out en masse to hear Professor Copeland.

The hour for the election of officers was one of the most interesting of all, and all joined heartily in the applause and Chautauqua salute as Mrs. Eva Higgins, who has so long been our faithful president, was again presented to the convention, their choice for the coming year. Some of the officers of the past year declined renomination on account of other duties. The new officers are: Mrs. Eva Higgins, president; Rev. Ella F. Leonard, Rico, vice-president; Mrs. S. L. Teetor, Denver, corresponding secretary; Mrs. A. F. Newton, Colorado Springs, recording secretary; Mrs. M. F. Sprague, Denver, treasurer. There are very few changes in the superintendents of departments.

Among the pleasant features of the convention was the receiving of the telegraphic greeting from the Massachusetts W. C. T. U. state convention then in session.

The convention was indebted to the "Temple Immanuel Orchestra," the "Excelsior Quartette" and the "Pansy Trio" for many excellent selections as well as to many fine soloists for their sweet songs.

One of our signs of progress this new year is the issuing of a state paper all our own. We have christened it The W. C. T. U. Messenger. It will be edited by our corresponding secretary, Mrs. S. L. Teetor, and will be brimful of news for our unions. The children have their department edited by their state superintendent.

PENNSYLVANIA.

STATE GATHERING.

This was not our "majority" convention but we can confidently assure you that we are within one of it, anyway. October 12 was the time designated for the gathering of the (white ribbon) clans and "On to Philadelphia" was their watchword. Philadelphia is called the "city of brotherly love"—but in this case it might have appropriately been called the city of sisterly love as many evidences of it were shown to their visiting sisters and comrades.

The place of meeting was the spacious Conwell Temple and no better one could have been secured. This was beautifully decorated with flags and banners from the different counties. The convention opened promptly at nine o'clock by the president, Mrs. Hammer. After prayer the roll was called, to which the state officers responded. I will not attempt to give in detail the full program of each day's sessions, but will give a brief resumé of some of the special features which made this the most notable of conventions yet held in our state.

First, the presence of so many of our notable women. First, our Frances E. Willard,—First, last and always in the hearts of the white-ribboners. Then Lady Henry Somerset, Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, of Maine; Mrs. M. B. Carse, of Temple fame; Mrs. Frances Barnes, National Y Secretary; Mrs. M. H. Hunt, Miss Greenwood, Miss Helen Hood, British Woman's Organizer; Dr. Anna Shaw, Rev. Henrietta Moore, Mrs. Ellen D. Blair, Miss Cummings, of South Africa; Miss Anna Sloane, of California; Mrs. Rachel Foster Avery, of the National Council of Women; Mrs. Emma Bourne, president of New Jersey, and Mrs. Singly. Regretfully do we exclaim, feeling that we voice the sentiments of the stay-at-homes of our constituency—"Just think what we missed!"

The music of the convention was specially fine. A new departure was taken this year in the selection of a musical director, and this proved to be such a success that the office will be continued, not only in "our next," but we hope in all future conventions. Mrs. Harry B. Erdman, of Philadelphia, was the very efficient leader this year, and was chosen for the ensuing year. The Conwell ladies quartette, the Temple choir, Misses Hubbert and Bump, Mrs. Geo. D. Miller and Mrs. Erdman furnished most delightful music at the different sessions of the convention, and Mrs. C. H. Woolston very ably presided as accompanist at the piano.

The addresses of welcome by Rev. Russell H. Conwell and Dr. Harriet French and the responses by Mrs. S. V. Heaton and Miss Amanda Landes were each models. The evening addresses delivered by Miss Moore and Miss Shaw will not soon be forgotten by those who heard them, while that of Lady Henry Somerset on the "Voice of God," together with the address of Miss Willard, have made a lasting impression on the minds and hearts of their hearers.

The president's annual address was truly a "feast of good things," as well as an inspiration for better work in the future. The past year has been a busy one in the history of our president. She has spoken over one hundred and sixty times, and has traveled many thousand miles up and down the great "Keystone state" in her attendance upon seventeen conventions. Her address was received with applause.

The corresponding secretary's report showed that out of sixty-seven counties we "possess the land" in all but four. Who will be the Joshua to go up and organize in these counties? The treasurer's report showed the finances to be in good condition. The reports from the various superintendents showed faithful work. As an evidence that good may sometimes come out of seeming evil one of the good results of the notorious Breckinridge trial is that women are roused to action in the department of social purity and demand the same standard of purity in both sexes.

Several new departments were created with the following superintendents at the head: Systematic giving, Miss Ida Kimball, superintendent, and that of state industries, with Mrs. H. W. Palmer as superintendent, than whom no better selection could have been made. The literature department was given into the hands of the general officers, and Miss Etta Ersenhart was given the department of prison work as Miss Pew, former superintendent, is now county president of Mercer county. Mrs. Hammer is still editor and Mrs. Forrest publisher of our state paper, The Bulletin, and under their efficient management the paper is now in an excellent condition.

The Bible readings by Miss Greenwood were sources of great spiritual power and were much enjoyed by all.

Pennsylvania white-ribboners evidently appreciate a corps of good officers when they have them, as each of the former officers were unanimously elected.

Miss Puella Dornblazer is a success at gathering in the money, as well as a reciter.

Two hundred and ninety delegates were in attendance. Mrs. M. H. Jones, vice-president-at-large, received a hearty welcome from her white-ribbon comrades.

The Calisthenics class, conducted by Mrs. M. B. Ross, was just the "rest" needed.

Harrisburg is the place chosen for celebrating our "majority" convention next year.

Dr. Harriet French is truly a veteran in temperance work, having been engaged in it for forty years.

Y night deserves more than a passing notice, the exercises being all very fine.

CONNECTICUT.

STATE CONVENTION.

In the name of God the Woman's Christian Temperance Union set up its banner in the First M. E. Church in the city of Waterbury, October 23, and began the twenty-first convention of the organization. A full executive meeting was held at 10:30 o'clock, but the convention did not really get to work till 1:45 p. m., when the president, Mrs. Forbes, called the delegates to order. About two hundred and seventy-five delegates were present, representing one hundred and thirty unions. The ladies who came to act for the unions are representative of the unions from which they come: some unions send three but most of them are entitled to but two delegates, and the average number of unions in a county is sixteen. Of these, two are usually Y unions.

As the result of my tests, I find the ROYAL BAKING POWDER superior to all the others in every respect. It is entirely free from all adulteration and unwholesome impurity, and in baking it gives off a greater volume of leavening gas than any other powder. It is therefore not only the purest, but also the strongest powder with which I am acquainted.

The decorations in the church were most attractive. A local paper called the pretty little pages "ministering fairies," and perhaps it was not so very far from correct. The afternoon service opened with a devotional meeting led by Mrs. Forbes, and the roll call followed. The first business was the consideration of a recommendation of the executive committee, which was as follows:

That the constitution be amended in accordance with that of the National body to the effect that the constitution may be altered or amended by a two-thirds vote at any annual meeting provided that notice be given of the subject matter at a previous annual meeting; that at least once during the year a convention of all the unions in the county shall be held, and that at the annual meeting a county president, vice-president and secretary shall be elected, the president to be vice-president of the state for that county; that Article I. of the constitution, relating to name, be changed, making the name of the organization "The Woman's Temperance Union of Connecticut," this union to be auxiliary to the National W. C. T. U. (This change was proposed so as to accord with the incorporated name of the organization); that the Loyal Temperance Legion be represented in the state convention by the election of one delegate from each county, such delegate to be elected at the county convention and to be chosen from the superintendents or leaders of L. T. L. work, and such delegate to be an adult member of the W. C. T. U. or the Y. W. C. T. U., the basis of representation to be the payment of one cent into the state treasury for every member of a Legion; that the basis of award of the children's banner be left with the state superintendent of children's work.

Consideration of these recommendations was postponed till later in the session when they were all adopted.

The address of welcome was given in sections, by Mrs. Emma Cook, of the local union, and by Miss Emma Lewis, of the Y. Mrs. Louisa Bunce, of Hartford county union, replied. Reports showed no great gains, but were not discouraging, for work has been done, and there is no falling off when the work as a whole is considered.

Short addresses were made by Rev. J. H. James, of Rockville, secretary of the Connecticut temperance union; Madame Layah Barakat, the Rev. H. M. Kellogg, of Wolcott; Rev. Mr. Bell, of Massachusetts; and Mrs. Ella M. Keith, superintendent of railroad work in Massachusetts. A "children's hour" was conducted by Mrs. Fitz Gerald in the church parlors and was most interesting.

An address with the tones of welcome ringing through it was given by the pastor of the church in the evening, Rev. Gardner Eldridge. The principal address was made by Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, superintendent of the department of scientific temperance instruction. The speaker used her strong arguments that she has used to such good purpose in the cause and that have helped create and put into action so many measures for the securing of better instruction of the children of our common schools. Mrs. Fitz Gerald made a merry little collection speech and with the benediction the service closed.

On the second day of the convention a message of sympathy was sent to Mrs. White, president of Windham county, who was ill at her home and unable to be present. Madam Barakat gave a beautiful Bible reading. Mr. Roger Andrews, the son of our state secretary, was present and spoke briefly. The usual sad and impressive memorial service was conducted by Mrs. John B. Smith, of New Britain. It consisted of a Scripture reading, a duet by Mrs. John Lines and Mrs. P. C. Cowles, and a short sketch of each of the twenty-five active and five honorary members who have died during the past year. Among those included was Mrs. W. P. Edson, who was once president of the local union. The meeting closed with prayer by Mrs. Herr, of Norwich. Mrs. Blake, of Bridgeport, spoke in behalf of the Sanford Orphanage of that city, a home for the children of Christian parents where they can be brought up under Christian care instead of being sent to the institution provided by the state. Mrs. Blake asked for the sympathy and prayers of those present.

The treasurer made her report and the summary is as follows: Miscellaneous receipts, $2,406.61; disbursements, $1,975.20. The secretary reported 10 unions and 13 Y's, with a membership of 3,616. Six new unions have been organized during the year, and to our shame it is said that while 110 Loyal Temperance Legions retain the name many are not working for want of leaders. The approximate membership is about seven thousand.

The most important event of the afternoon was the reading of the president's annual address. She spoke of all the interests dear and near to us as an organization, and gave a rapid outline of the whole work and a kind of review of that which lies before us. At the close of the address the county presidents were introduced and each said a few words; new union presidents were also presented to the convention and were cordially greeted.

The exercise, "Why I became a white-ribboner," was led by Mrs. C. B. Buell, and it was a touching service. The reasons given by some were pathetic and brought tears to the eyes of the listeners. Mrs. FitzGerald made her report of Loyal Temperance Legion and Band of Mercy. The banner was given to the Pawcatuck Legion. This L. T. L. banner is a dainty white and gold one and is the desire of every Legion.

The storm of the evening was the means of keeping many from the church who desired to hear Madame Bakarat, that bright, earnest little woman. She told her story interestingly as she always does. Good music and a very pleasant devotional service opened the meeting and every one was sorry when the benediction was said. Mrs. Keith, who is so much at home with the work for railroad men, urged the ladies to do a similar kind of work in this state, saying that we can not afford to neglect it and that it brings its own reward in the gratitude of those who are benefited by it.

The last day of the convention was rainy and the delegates had to go laden with umbrellas and storm cloaks, but this did not in the least dull their ardor, if one could judge by the faces of the company. The morning was much taken up with the left over matters of business. The important report for the afternoon was that presented by the committee on resolution and this occupied some time. The Y hour followed and was full of good things. Mrs. Barnes was present. A fine recitation was given by Miss Ivy Terrill, of the Middlefield Y, and a paper was read by Miss Mary Huntington, of Norwich. The same officers of the union were elected and substantially the same superintendents. The evening service was one of the pleasantest but many of the delegates were gone and so lost the excellent lecture by Mrs. Barnes and the closing of the convention which was unique. A hymn was sung and was the one always used, "God be with you till we meet again," which was followed by responsive reading of Scripture and alternate singing. And thus the session closed and "the books are closed" till we meet again.

NEW JERSEY.

IN TWENTY-FIRST CONVENTION.

Little Jersey's white ribbon clans gathered October 23 to celebrate their majority, to congratulate themselves on having arrived at a voting age, and to declare their unalterable intention to help ring the death knell of the liquor traffic. Among the earliest state organizations, it prides itself on its unswerving loyalty to the parent organization, and its unconquerable pluck. It is in the battle till the fight is ended, be the time long or short.

Jersey City opened its hospitable doors to house and entertain 220 delegates and more homes were ready to receive guests than there were guests to be received. One of the historic churches of the city, the Bergen Avenue Reformed church, organized in 1664, opened its audience room, its spacious parlors, Sunday-school and class rooms, minister's study and dining room for our use.

State and county banners, palms, flowers, pictures of Miss Willard and Mrs. Downs, with the national colors, white ribbon and quantities of white drapery, composed the decorations. The music was in charge of Mrs. Wilson, of West Philadelphia. The choir of the church rendered several beautiful selections, and eighteen members of the "Iron Cross Army" won much applause on Y night by their spirited singing. Mrs. Wilson's and Mrs. Sluther's solos charmed all.

The devotional seasons were moments of help and uplift. The routine business, in the hands of our state president, Mrs. Emma Bourne, was quickly and smoothly carried on. Her address was able and eminently practical, giving a bird's-eye view of the work accomplished and showing strategic points where we should mass our endeavors for the coming year.

The reports of Mrs. Ellis, corresponding secretary, and Mrs. Caminade, treasurer, were most encouraging, showing gains in unions, in individual members, in efficiency in work, and in hard cash. Burlington county was the banner county for increase of membership. Essex county for the most money raised. The reports were grouped under their appropriate heads thus giving a symposium on each class. All showed faithful effort and interested workers.

Greetings were received by letters from the National headquarters, from Michigan, from Mother Penfield and others. As the news went around the convention that Mrs. Woodbridge had left us for her "Ain Country," every face expressed the sorrow the heart felt at our loss, and her written message came as a clarion note from the other shore. Mrs. Denman, our first state president, was with us through almost the entire convention, and her presence was a benediction.

Many visitors were with us, among them Mrs. Hammer, Pennsylvania's honored president, whom yet, New Jersey claims as her very own. She gave us an exceedingly helpful Bible reading on Wednesday on the "Fear Not's of the Bible." Miss Julia Colman, Mrs. Vanderhoef, president of Kings county, N. Y., Mrs. Morris, president of Richmond county, N. Y., Mrs. Reynolds, president of a Brooklyn union, were presented, and made us feel that these were comrades tried and true, whose work and ours were one. Mrs. Whittier, of Minnesota, brought greetings from her western home.

Ministers and professors, editors and business men who looked in upon our gathering, were presented, and gave words of suggestion and cheer which were cordially received.

Jupiter Pluvius thought it best to announce to the city that a band of cold water workers were in town, and poured down quantities of that sometimes despised fluid. But this dampened no one's ardor and the audiences were good. A delegation of the city's L. T. L's, headed by a drum corps came on Wednesday afternoon to see the convention. They sang, recited, and were addressed by Mrs. Ellis, Mrs. Barnes and Mrs. Hammer.

Our corresponding secretary, Mrs. Ellis, who has served the state so faithfully for thirteen years, was presented by Mrs. MacMinn with a golden gift from 220 loving delegates. Early conferences of presidents, secretaries, treasurers, L. T. L's, literature superintendents, Y's and other workers were held, while the main body of delegates had devotional service. When the report of the superintendent of unfermented wine had been read, a delegate asked if any one present knew personally of any who had fallen through the use of fermented wine at the sacrament. This brought many to their feet and saddening experiences were related of those who had found the intended cup of blessing the cup of devils.

The franchise report also elicited questions and answers, which showed that New Jersey's white-ribboners are wide awake to the fact that to make their work more effective they must have a vote for the home, where now it often has none.

The evening meetings were well attended, and were literary temperance feasts. The opening evening session was spent in finding out how glad the people of Jersey City were to have us come among them, and then in letting them know how glad we were to

of all cases of consumption can, if taken in the earlier stages of the disease, be cured. This may seem like a bold assertion to those familiar only with the means generally in use for its treatment; as, nasty cod-liver oil and its filthy emulsions, extract of malt, whiskey, different preparations of hypophosphites and such like palliatives.

Although by many believed to be incurable, there is the evidence of hundreds of living witnesses to the fact that, in all its earlier stages, consumption is a curable disease. Not every case, but a large percentage of cases, and we believe, fully 98 per cent. are cured by Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, even after the disease has progressed so far as to induce repeated bleedings from the lungs, severe lingering cough with copious expectoration (including tubercular matter), great loss of flesh and extreme emaciation and weakness.

Do you doubt that hundreds of such cases reported to us as cured by "Golden Medical Discovery" were genuine cases of that dread and fatal disease? You need not take our word for it. They have, in nearly every instance, been so pronounced by the best and most experienced home physicians, who have no interest whatever in misrepresenting them, and who were often strongly prejudiced and advised against a trial of "Golden Medical Discovery," but who have been forced to confess that it surpasses, in curative power over this fatal malady, all other medicines with which they are acquainted. Nasty cod-liver oil and its filthy "emulsions" and mixtures, had been tried in nearly all these cases and had either utterly failed to benefit, or had only seemed to benefit a little for a short time. Extract of malt, whiskey, and various preparations of the hypophosphites had also been faithfully tried in vain.

The photographs of a large number of those cured of consumption, bronchitis, lingering coughs, asthma, chronic nasal catarrh and kindred maladies, have been skillfully reproduced in a book of 160 pages which will be mailed to you, on receipt of address and six cents in stamps. You can then write those cured and learn their experience.

have the opportunity to come. Cornelius Brett, D. D., pastor of the church where the convention was held, gave a very hearty and spicy welcome. Mayor Wauser, by letter, regretted his forced absence, but sent a cordial greeting. Mrs. Cairns, president of Hudson county, to whose untiring efforts and determination much of the success of the convention was due, welcomed us very winningly. Mrs. Alice May Scudder, in her happy, earnest manner, greeted us in the name of the Christian Endeavor workers of the city and state, and also for the Junior Endeavorers, who were being trained in total abstinence principles. Mayor Z. Pangborn, one of the veteran editors of the city, brought the greetings and congratulations of the press.

Mrs. Greenman, president of Morris county, was equal to the occasion, and briefly but wittily responded to all. Then added to all this, was the address of Dr. Anna Shaw, who moved her audience to smiles, tears, laughter, and at times made many look as if they were ashamed of themselves.

The second evening was Y night, and though it poured, the drops fairly jumping up in glee as they fell, the attendance was good and the meeting interesting. Miss Mary Campbell, Y secretary, presided, and gave the report of the year's Y work. Mrs. Frances Barnes delivered the address, and was winning as usual. Mrs. Thacher gracefully presented the Y banner which the Florence Y's gained last year for increase of membership to the Rahway Y's who had outdistanced the other competitors.

George W. Bain was the speaker on the third evening and was at his very best, which is saying a good deal. One of the inspirations of the evening was the presence of companies of the Boys' Brigade, seventy-four members, and a society of twenty young boys from the Summit Avenue Baptist church. They marched in to the hymn, "Onward, Christian Soldier," and were seated in the body of the church. Mr. Bain, in his address, paid an eloquent tribute to Mrs. Hunt's educational work, and at the close of this speech Mrs. Hunt was presented, making a short, wise and witty address to the boys.

Thursday afternoon Mrs. Hunt held a conference on teaching temperance physiology, which was especially timely in view of the fact that New Jersey begins this school year to work under its scientific temperance instruction law. The officers were reëlected, the resolution committee presented sound and pointed resolutions and its convention over, New Jersey's W. C. T. U. goes forward to finish paying for its cottage on the state fair grounds at Waverly, to push organization, to mass its efforts of strategic points and to help all along the line. May God give it victory!

DELAWARE.

FIFTEENTH ANNIVERSARY.

The fifteenth annual convention of Delaware was held in Wilmington, on October 17 to 19. The devotional services were conducted by Mrs. R. H. Matlack, state superintendent of evangelistic work. The remainder of the morning was occupied with the appointing of various committees and assigning homes to the delegates. Rev. T. E. Terry, pastor of St. Paul's church, extended a hearty greeting to the members of the convention. The afternoon session was opened by Miss Greenwood, who dwelt on courage in teaching. Miss Annie Semple, who was the first president of the Wilmington union, extended a very kind welcome to the delegates. She was followed by Mrs. A. H. Berlin in an address of welcome. Mrs. Adam Stengle responded in behalf of the delegates and members of convention.

The Revs. L. E. Barrett, J. B. Quigg, John France and L. W. Layfield were introduced and gave words of greeting and encouragement. Miss Belle Kearney, of Mississippi, was introduced and made a member of convention. Mrs. E. Elma Pyle, corresponding secretary, reviewed the year's work, showing an increase in membership and also an increase in interest along many lines of work.

Miss Margaret S. Hilles, state president, delivered her annual address. She said: "The outlook is full of promise for future years. The women have been called out from their homes and are not found wanting in intelligence and action concerning matters which affect the larger family circle. Some of our critics are filled with fear lest we go beyond our proper sphere; we dare not linger, but hasten to the rescue."

In the evening a delightful reception was given the members of convention, by the New Century Club, in their beautiful parlors. Mrs. Abbie N. Miller, president of the club, extended greetings. Good music was rendered and light refreshments served.

Thursday morning Mrs. M. H. Green read the report of the executive committee giving a résumé of the work accomplished during the year. A letter of regret was read from Miss Willard. As we were not permitted to have her with us as we had hoped, this was next best—a letter giving us words of cheer and suggestions for the coming year.

The state treasurer, Mrs. Hattie M. Phelps, read her report, showing a good balance in hand. The county presidents, Mrs. M. S. Cranston, Mrs. Kate E. Smithers and Mrs. Abbie L. Fisher gave encouraging reports of work done in their respective counties.

Miss Bessie Mills, superintendent of Y work, showed that the Y's are keeping pace with the W's. Loyal Temperance Legion work was reported by superintendent, Marion H. Price. Their membership has increased considerably during the year. Mrs. T. K. Jones reported Demorest medal contests; eight were held during the year, and quite an interest manifested wherever they were held. She earnestly urged that more work be done along this line. In the afternoon Miss Greenwood gave another of her excellent Bible readings.

One hundred and twenty-nine delegates and officers were present, a larger number than ever present at our convention before. Superintendent D. W. Harlan, of public schools, gave a short talk on what is being done in the way of teaching the effects of alcohol and tobacco in our public schools. He thinks children should be taught temperance when they begin school. Scientific temperance was reported by the superintendent, Mrs. E. D. Slaymaker; Sunday-school work by Mrs. E. H. Capelle and Mrs. A. H. Berlin; temperance literature by Mrs. E. R. Butter; press work by Miss Annie Sutton. A report of agent of THE UNION SIGNAL, Mrs. M. L. Cox, was read. Memorial services were conducted by Mrs. R. H. Matlack. Several of our sisters have "passed over" during the year.

Mrs. Ella Boole addressed a large audience in the evening. Her address was a strong plea for total abstinence for the individual and prohibition for the state. Friday morning the reports of superintendents were continued. Evangelistic work by Mrs. R. H. Matlack; prison and jail work, Mrs. N. B. Smithers; social purity by Mrs. L. C. Marks, who gave an interesting account of the work being done in the Industrial Home for girls; legislation by Mrs. Mary M. Wolcott, and franchise by Mrs. M. S. Cranston.

The old officers were reëlected except treasurer, Miss Sallie Rawlins taking the place of Mrs. H. M. Phelps, who has served us faithfully for five years. She expects to leave the state, hence the cause for making a change. A collection was taken for the Temperance Hospital.

The sessions of the convention were all well attended and a deep interest manifested by members and visitors. By invitation of the board of managers, many of the delegates and friends visited the Industrial Home and the Froebel kindergarten; at the latter place tea was served. This school is in charge of the Y's who are doing a noble work. Miss Belle Kearney was the speaker of this evening. She delivered an able address to a large audience.

The convention closed Friday evening, and we think all went home feeling that they had spent three very pleasant and profitable days.

GEORGIA.

STILL MOVING.

Perhaps our white ribbon sisters hearing nothing from Georgia for so long a time begin to fear that the Georgia W. C. T. U. has yielded to the pressure and, rather than longer face the wrath of the "brethren," has seceded from the National even as it was bidden to do. Not so; we grieve when the forces which should be fighting a common foe train their guns upon one another, but Georgia white-ribboners insist upon thinking for themselves, and obeying the dictates of their own consciences, however much their views may clash with those of Doctors of Divinity and college presidents. Accordingly at our last state convention our women explicitly reaffirmed their loyalty to the National. This was done, not because there is a whisper of secession in our own ranks, but that our rejection of the woman's suffrage plank of the National might not be misunderstood by our home foes.

The report of our corresponding secretary shows twenty-three local unions reporting while thirty more are known to be alive and at work. Superintendents' reports show that efficient work is being done along many lines throughout the state. One of the most successful of our departments is that of the Demorest medal contests. During the last year 163 gold and silver medals have been won in the state and every one of them means temperance sentiment created and temperance enthusiasm aroused.

The L. T. L. department, under Miss Lily Reynolds as superintendent, is doing its own quiet but most effective work—work that only the future can measure. We have twenty-six active Legions.

Perhaps the most encouraging work being done in the state is that of the seventh district of which Mrs. A. M. Street is president. Four years ago this little woman moved to the town of Summerville. She found it possessed by four saloons. She had not been a W. C. T. U. worker, but she procured our literature and went to work. She has organized unions and L. T. L's throughout the district in the face of all kinds of discouragement and opposition. Last March, very largely as the result of her efforts, the town by a good majority, voted the saloons down and out.

The Demorest union, in the ninth district, is the second in the state in the amount of dues paid. It also owns headquarters free of debt, and these headquarters are furnished with tables, chairs, an organ and pictures of all our leaders and of the Temple. The women keep constantly on hand a full supply of literature which they do up in packages and distribute to all the country wagons which come into town. Last summer at the Northeast Georgia Chautauqua held at Demorest, these enterprising white-ribboners had daily sessions of the school of methods. So much for what a few consecrated, determined women can do. The rest of us in Georgia look at their work and thank God and take courage.

But while other portions of the state may not be able to make quite so good a showing as our Demorest sisters, we are "pegging away," and are doing something to swell the sum total of the results of our grand National W. C. T. U.

Those who are acquainted with Miss Missouri Stokes will rejoice with us to learn that her health is greatly improved. Miss Stokes served us so many years as state corresponding secretary, and did her work so devotedly, unselfishly and efficiently that when her health failed, and we were obliged to find another to fill her place we did not know which way to turn. It hardly seemed that the Georgia W. C. T. U. could get along without her. We now hope that she may be able to join our ranks once more and give us the encouragement and cheer of her presence even if she never feels able to enter again into such active work as she did in the past.

NEW LEAFLETS.

Our new department leaflet by Miss Anna Downey upon "Hints for Gospel Temperance Meetings" in the first paragraph reveals its value to every department of W. C. T. U. work. A leaflet which answers the question, "How can we reach the people?" if carefully studied, must create fresh zeal in every union in the land. Read it and catch the inspiration of the closing sentence: "Faith, hope, love, earnestness, inspired by the presence of God, can not do otherwise than produce fruitful service."

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

MRS. MARY MCGEE SNELL has been constantly preaching since February, and more than eight hundred conversions have resulted from her meetings.

APLEASANN incident of the Nebraska convention was the presenting of souvenir spoons—one for each year of service—to both Mrs. Wakelin and Mrs. Lantry.

COODY'S BLUFF, I. T., is located in an agricultural district with only a postoffice, store and schoolhouse, yet there are some loyal hearts there "who have hearkened to Isaiah's prophecy" (32:9-11). They have a W. C. T. Union and a woman's suffrage club and held a prohibition and suffrage contest last summer.

FRUIT, jelly and delicacies for the sick will be gladly received by the flower mission committee of the Willard Y. W. C. T. U. of Chicago, and will be taken to hospitals and the sick in other places where these aids to convalescence are unknown. Send by express prepaid, if possible, to Miss Grace Greenlee, Room 1113, The Temple, Chicago, Ill.

LADY HENRY SOMERSET gave a check for twenty-five dollars as her self-denial contribution to be equally divided between the World's and National W. C. T. U. She saved the money by going alone to Boston when she always has some one with her to help her with her baggage, letters and many cares, so that it was a piece of genuine self-denial.

A FAREWELL reception was given at Lake Bluff recently to Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Jutkins, and a presentation speech made by Rev. C. G. Trusdell. These honored friends of temperance and prohibition have removed to Los Angeles, S. Cal., to be with their niece and to enjoy that milder climate. The blessings of all white-ribboners go with Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Jutkins wherever they may abide.

MRS. ANNIE W. DILLET, of Nassau, president of the W. C. T. U. of the Bahama Islands, desires us to extend hearty greeting to all white-ribboners who may visit the Bahamas during the winter, with an invitation to visit W. C. T. U. headquarters at their hall on Bay street, in rear of the Masonic Temple, where they will be most cordially welcomed. We trust many may avail themselves of this invitation, helping by the way and strengthening the bonds by which we are united.

THE following young women's colleges have organized temperance societies under the name of "Somerset Y" in honor of Lady Henry Somerset: Wellesley, Holyoke, Northfield (D. L. Moody's college) and Ashburnham. This work has been done under the auspices of Mrs. S. S. Fessenden, at No. 171 Tremont St., Boston, president of the W. C. T. U. of Massachusetts. White ribbon women wishing to learn the method of organization can do so by addressing Mrs. Fessenden at the above address, or Miss Caroline Caswell, state Y secretary, 278 Ferry St., Malden, Mass.

MRS. J. G. HAUSER has given her illustrated Oriental lecture five times, namely, twice in Auburndale, Mass., in West Brookfield, Mass., in Manchester, N. H., and in Pawling, N. Y. In each instance the income from admission fees has exceeded expenses, and in Manchester a really handsome surplus was left over. The young people who assisted with the costumes got a great deal of fun out of the rehearsals but behaved beautifully on the occasion of the lecture. Any who wish to give this entertainment can address Mrs. Hauser at Auburndale, Mass.

MRS. FRANK S. EVANS, the lieutenant of Mrs. Frances J. Barnes, lo, these many years, not only works for temperance young people with an intelligence and devotion that few have ever manifested, but is corresponding secretary of the Home of the Friendless, New York city, which has sheltered over forty thousand little ones; has twelve schools with an annual registry of between five and six thousand and a daily average of over two thousand; and many other correlated enterprises all speaking of the love of woman's heart for the pitiful little ones who were worse than orphans.

MRS. B. STURTEVANT-PEET and Mrs. Dorcas J. Spencer, president and recording secretary of California W. C. T. U. send this item: "Mrs. M. E. Teats, superintendent of the department of promotion of purity in the California W. C. T. U., will be in attendance at the National Convention at Cleveland, and will be glad to make appointments after the Convention in Iowa and Nebraska as she is returning to California. Mrs. Teats is an acceptable speaker on general lines and is a specialist in her own department. Her work in California guarantees that she will help and strengthen the unions wherever she goes and interest those who have not been interested before."

A UNIQUE entertainment was given by the Evanston W. C. T. U. October 4, at the home of Mrs. George Price. It was called a "Mary Temperance Social," and the program was a pleasant surprise to the one hundred guests that gathered in the spacious parlors. A hymn and a Bible reading—the story of Mary and Martha—were followed by prayer. Mrs. Reiley, district president, gave a memoriam of the three temperance Marys who have "gone on," Mary Hill Willard, Mary Allen West and the Mary of "Nineteen Beautiful Years." The "temperance Marys" then appeared in succession, each giving a brief account of her own life and works and how she became interested in temperance. Among the happy impersonations were represented, Mrs. Mary Hunt, Mrs. Mary Burt, Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap, Miss Mary Lathbury, Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt, Mrs. Mary A. Livermore, Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge, Mrs. Mary B. Willard, Miss Mary McDowell, etc. Music was sandwiched between the numbers, much amusement being caused by the singing of "Mary had a little lamb," by a quartette of college students.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE HOSPITAL.

It is with great regret the omission of the name of Mrs. C. E. Bigelow, the honored treasurer of the National Temperance Hospital, is noted in the report of the election at the last annual meeting. Mrs. Bigelow was reëlected without a dissenting vote. She could not well be spared. All checks should be sent made out in her name, and all membership fees or donations in cash sent direct to her. Please note name and address in full: Mrs. C. E. Bigelow, treasurer, 539 West Adams St., Chicago, Ill. All donations in goods, however, should be addressed to Mrs. Sarah M. Hornby, 1619 Diversey Ave., Chicago, Ill.

Mrs. Hornby reports the weather cool enough for shipment of fruits and vegetables, and is hoping for a generous supply before the weather gets too cold. A small amount has been received, and is acknowledged at this time. It has been decided to publish monthly lists of donations, so that friends can thus be assured of the prompt receipt of the same. All who have set aside fruits and jellies are requested to send at once, and friends and W. C. T. Unions are urged to arrange for gathering a small amount of vegetables, apples, etc., and their immediate shipment. A little from many, gathered together, makes generous provision for such an institution. Barrels of apples and potatoes for such purposes have been gathered by asking each child in a Sunday-school or a public school to bring and donate one apple and one potato, and such donations are always the largest and finest samples from every cellar. Poultry or eggs would also be acceptable.

Mrs. Hornby reports, and the board desires to acknowledge the receipt of money enough to buy the necessary table-linen, for which donations were requested. The next demand is for dishes—a new dinner set being very much needed.

To turn from need to ministry. At the annual meeting reports showed that 165 patients had been received during the year, 107 females and 58 males. Eighty-eight different diseases were reported, and nine deaths. One hundred and seventy-nine surgical operations were performed. California, Colorado, Georgia, Illinois, Idaho, Indiana, Kansas, Louisiana, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Mexico, New York, Ohio, South Dakota, Virginia and Wisconsin furnished some of these patients. They were: African, 1; American, 101; Canadian, 6; Danish, 1; English, 9; French, 2; German, 18; Irish, 6; Norwegian, 5; Scotch, 2; Swedish, 11.

The hospital is full as usual now. The children's beds are occupied, one by a child who has pneumonia; the other is a case of St. Vitus' Dance. The L. T. L. will be glad to bring relief to these little sufferers.

The following are the

A FLESH MAKER.

A NEW SCIENTIFIC PREPARATION.

A Godsend to Thin, Emaciated, Dyspeptic People.

In these days of wonderful medical discoveries, cure-alls, sarsaparillas, pre-digested foods, etc., it is refreshing to note the appearance of a scientific preparation which does not claim to cure everything under the sun.

This new preparation is prepared and designed solely to cure stomach and digestive weakness; every ingredient composing it has some specific curative action on the process of digestion, and in every form of dyspepsia or indigestion it can be relied on as a safe, harmless cure.

The remedy is known as Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, and its wonderful success as a cure for indigestion seems to result from the fact that it causes the digestion and assimilation of flesh forming food, whether the stomach is in good working order or not. Flesh forming foods, like meat, eggs, oatmeal, etc., form the very basis of life, and the reason people become thin, consumptive, weak, languid, with no ambition for work, is because their stomachs refuse to digest these all-important articles of food. The moment you supply something to the stomach which will digest them the question of curing dyspepsia is solved. This is exactly what the manufacturers of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets have succeeded in accomplishing. One or two of the Tablets taken after eating are immediately dissolved, mingle with the food in the stomach and digest it properly, no matter how weak or deranged the stomach may be. When the Tablets are used it is impossible for the food to lie in the stomach, for hours, fermenting, souring, decaying; forming gas and filling the blood with the poisons of half-digested food.

Poor digestion not only makes people thin, it causes violent headaches, sleeplessness, constipation, heart troubles, a weak, languid, good-for-nothing feeling and long-continued indigestion can only result in some serious nervous or chronic disease.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets can be found at most drug stores at the nominal cost of 50 cts. per package. Ask your druggist about them. Circulars and testimonials sent free by Stuart Co., Marshall, Mich.

Our Library Table.

American Authors. A hand-book of American Literature from Early Colonial to Living Writers. By Mildred Rutherford, Athens, Ga.

This sizeable volume opens with a list of important dates in American history. Following is a brief sketch of American Literature. Beginning with Captain John Smith, 1579–1631, brief chapters are given to American writers, illustrated by portraits. Each sketch is followed by a series of review questions. Nearly eight hundred pages are given to these sketches, the whole forming a valuable and complete reference book.

Lucy Larcom: Life, Letters and Diary. By Daniel Dulany Addison. Published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston and New York. Price $1.25.

Everyone who has had the rare pleasure of reading Miss Larcom's book, "A New England Girlhood," in which she portrayed with such magic of pen her own youthful days, will hail with anticipation of a feast of fat things, the above named volume. Mr. Addison states in his preface that it had been Miss Larcom's intention to write a sequel to "A New England Girlhood," and had gone so far as to make some notes, select the title and also some headings for chapters. She would have called the work "Hitherward: A Life-Path Retraced." But the path led her suddenly "beyond the gates" and she can never retrace its upward goings for mortal eyes. Mr. Addison has fulfilled his task well and the book in question will be much in demand by the wide circle whom Miss Larcom has helped by her wondrous words behind which lay a beautiful life.

A Matter of Honor. Two Knights-Errant. These are two booklets in dainty gift-book dress, each filled with Barbara Yechton's delightful short stories of children and child-life. The illustrations are by Harriet Rosevelt Richards. Miss Yechton has an unusual gift in this direction. Her booklets make very acceptable Christmas gifts.

Thomas Whittaker, 2 and 3 Bible House, New York. Price each 60 cts.

Occasionally on the book shelf of a lover of quaint lore one stumbles upon a volume of tales spun by that favorite poet of the German nation, Rudolph Baumbach. In these "Summer Legends" one tarries with wonder-folk, who show their love of lovers by mysterious interpositions. This charmingly simple little German book has made friends who would fain read more of such imaginings and to such may be commended a volume of short stories under the title of The Flight of a Pigeon and Other Stories. One of the authors of these tales of magic is Arthur Henry, son of Mrs. S. M. I. Henry, long known to the public through her books and labors in the cause of temperance. Associated with him in the work is his girl wife, Maud Wood Henry. These joint authors are both newspaper writers connected at present with the Toledo Blade, respectively as city editor and reporter. Arthur Henry introduced himself in the book world some three or four years ago through a Southern political novel, "Nicholas Blood, Candidate." That book was the outcome of a sojourn in the South for Frank Leslie's magazine. Its forcible views on the negro problem which predicted a reign of terror for the South, owing to the rapid spread of a vicious and ignorant colored population, brought upon the author's head a shower of criticisms. Many of these were adverse, concerning the probability of the tale, but all warmly commended its artistic style and strength. Since he was a boy of seventeen, Arthur Henry has been identified with the daily newspaper both in Chicago and New York. Two years ago he left the Chicago Herald to accept an editorial position on the Toledo Blade. It was in the local room of that newspaper that he met his wife. Maud Wood was the first young woman to enter the field of regular staff work in Toledo. Within four years she has covered every assignment possible for a reporter, demonstrating that a girl may equal, or outdistance men in newspaper enterprise if she will. The Flight of a Pigeon is charmingly illustrated by one hundred sketches from the pen of Jessamy Harte, a celebrated artist of Plainfield, N. J. The Indian-haunted valley of the Maumee, where the young people wrote the above, and the antiquated village which bears its name, are to produce another volume before the year's end, a volume of forgotten legends and village sketches which will doubtless memorialize that historic region.

The World's Congress of Representative Women. Edited by May Wright Sewall. Published by Rand, McNally & Co., Chicago. Star Pub. Co., Chicago, General Sales Agents. Price, two volumes, $5.

To win for woman in the lower scales her rightful place, to waken in her a realization of her slavery, and implant a noble ambition and a thirst for freedom in her soul, was a chief part of the work taken upon itself by the Congress of women. To wipe away the few remaining disabilities yet imposed upon her, even in the highest civilizations, and to stimulate her to higher efforts in those spheres, jointly or peculiarly her own, were other objects of the meeting. To these ends women of every nation, and every color of thought, eminent in literature, in art and in philanthropy some of princely houses, others daughters of the people, met in conclave, conceived plans, systematized world-wide endeavor, laid their case before the bar of assembled nations, and set a seal on the sisterhood of woman. The official volume is the result of the labors of Mrs. May Wright Sewall, who held the responsible position of chairman of the committee of organization, and who was selected by those in charge of the matter as the person best fitted to perform the delicate task of editing the official report of the proceedings. She has done her work well and added to a reputation already more than national.

Portraits of the most celebrated participants in the Congress, numbering some one hundred and fifty, are included, and the two volumes cover nearly one thousand pages, making a work without which no woman's library, at least, can be complete. Special note should be taken of title and author as given above, since some are confusing this with another publication of a somewhat similar name.

Aunt Lizzie

THE

FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE OF AMERICA,

And for THIRTY YEARS the Missionary of the Second Baptist Church, Chicago.

Many of our readers have seen the genial face and have heard the tender words of "Aunt Lizzie" Aiken, but thousands know but little of her marvellous life as a nurse during the late Civil War, and her wonderful work as missionary for the Second Baptist Church and Sunday School, Chicago.

This biographical sketch by Mrs. Dr. Galusha Anderson, is a charming piece of literary work. It runs along with a flow as clear and simple and limpid as a running brook. Fascinating to young a d old, also instructive and inspiring. A capital book for a Christmas Gift. It will be sent postpaid on receipt of price, $1. Liberal discount to the trade. Address E. M. SPRAGUE, Publisher, 309 Wabash Av., Chicago.

THOREAU once received an offer of marriage from a young lady. In a letter to Emerson he said of it: "I sent back as determined a 'no' as I have learned to pronounce after considerable practice, and I trust that this 'no' has succeeded. Indeed, I wished that it might burst like hollow shot, after it had struck and buried itself and made itself felt there."

BELIEVE that the highest you ever have been you may be all the time, and vastly higher still if only the power of the Christ can occupy you and fill your life all the time.—Phillips Brooks.

As we go through life we are constantly reminding people of somebody by our tones, gestures, looks, attitudes. So should the Christian remind an on-looking world of Jesus Christ.

AN Irishman, contemplating the numerous hills and mountain ranges of New Hampshire, exclaimed: "I never was in a country before where they had so much land they had to stack it!"

SIN'S portals are barbed, and the barbs point in.

"MAMMA," said little eight-year-old, "just think how many important things happened this week! On the 17th St. Patrick drove all the snakes out of Ireland; on the 18th (Palm Sunday) Jesus rode into Jerusalem; on the 19th I was born; on the 20th our cat had kittens!"

HE who in questions of right, virtue or duty rates himself above ridicule is truly great, and shall laugh in the end with truer mirth than ever he was laughed at.

I WOULDNA gie a copper black
For ony mon that turns his back
On duty clear;
I wouldna tak his word or note,
I wouldna trust him for a groat,
Nor lift an oar in any boat
Which he might steer.
—Mrs. Barr.

OH! many a shaft at random sent,
Finds mark the archer little meant;
And many a word at random spoken,
May soothe or wound a heart that's broken.
—Scott.

DR. EDWARD EVERETT HALE, who has sounded so often the praises of sleep, is reported to have remarked that he had been giving throughout the West a lecture on sleep, with illustrations by the audience.

A WEE resident has been taught to save a piece of everything nice for "papa." The other day when a quantity of castor oil was being administered, a bright thought struck the youngster as he tasted it, and he said, "I dess I'll save the rest for papa."

A LITTLE Roxbury girl says she's not going to be an old maid; for, says she, "when a nice little grown-up boy comes to ask me to get married, I'll be so happy I won't wait to run downstairs, to meet him; I'll just slide down the banister."

A MOTHER was calling the attention of her little boy to the moon, which was to be seen clearly but pallidly in the early afternoon. "Why, you can't see the moon in the daytime!" replied the youngster. "Oh, yes, you can; there it is over the trees." The little fellow looked, and had to admit that he saw it; but he added, "'Tain't lighted, anyhow."

AT the dinner-table the other day, Mrs. C. remarked that the washerwoman (it being washday) had such a severe headache she could hardly hold up her head. Little Woodford, the bright little grandson of two and a half years, looked up and said: "Grandma, put on the check-rein."

A LITTLE girl, walking with her father in Central Park the other day, saw a little white duck swimming near a majestic swan, and exclaimed: "Oh, papa, look at that little duck with its nurse!"

RANGOON has a new temperance paper, organ of the Burma Total Abstinence Council, and well named The Life Line.

THE Scottish Permissive Bill and Temperance Association have issued a manifesto against the Gothenburg system and in favor of Prohibition.

ACCORDING to a recent enumeration Berlin has the largest number of beer drinkers and Brussels is celebrated as the city where the largest number of boys smoke.

CHINESE Christians are conducting an agitation against the cruel custom of foot-binding. At a gathering in the Central M. E. Church, Shanghai, numbering six hundred persons, a committee was appointed for an active crusade.

SWEAT-SHOPS, mostly in the hands of the Jews, number more than seven hundred in New York and nine hundred in Chicago. Ill-ventilated rooms are crowded with twenty to thirty workers where space would permit but eight, and these labor eighteen and twenty hours a day for enough to keep them alive.

TEMPERANCE is making gratifying progress in the English navy, through the effort of Miss Agnes Weston, superintendent of the Naval Temperance society. Nearly eleven thousand members are now enrolled, (a fifth of the men in the entire British fleet) and the society has a paper of its own called Ashore and Afloat.

MR. AARON M. POWELL has resigned his connection with the National Temperance Society and Publication House, as editor and secretary, and will hereafter edit The Philanthropist and represent the Philanthropist Publishing Company at No. 39 Nassau St., New York. He will prosecute the white cross and purity work, and continue to give attention to the national aspect of the drink problem. He will accept occasional invitations to lecture upon "The White Cross and Purity," "Woman as a Citizen," "The National Drink Problem," "Whittier," "Wendell Phillips" and "Glimpses in Europe."

THE Bombay Guardian joins with the Indian War Cry, the organ of the Salvation Army, in protesting against the introduction in Bombay of the jinrickisha as a mode of conveyance: "Whether it is true or not, as commonly believed, that the men who provide selfish Europeans with this means of travel, only live for three years, it is near enough to the truth to make it impossible for any man or woman of feeling and sensibility to patronize the custom. . . . In these days of poverty and fierce competition is it not a sin to tempt a man to earn a living by wrecking his body, and only for the sake of the rich gratifying a silly whim, for which, in Bombay especially, there is not the slightest justification?"

THE convention of Christian Workers, under the International Christian Workers' Association, which has been held annually for the last eight or ten years in various cities of the United States, is to be changed for the present into district conventions, through which it is expected to give to various cities throughout the country the large instruction and inspiration which usually attends one of these annual conventions. The first district convention was held October 25–31, in the Central Presbyterian church, Rochester, N. Y. Another gathering, similar in character to that of Rochester, will be held in November in Syracuse, and other conventions will be held during the year in Southern and Eastern states. Program and further information may be obtained from Rev. John C. Collins, New Haven, Conn.

DR. WILLIAM MOON, who died in Brighton, England, October 10, was well named the "apostle to the blind." Losing his sight at twenty-one years of age, he immediately devoted his life to the service of the blind, for whom he invented the simple type now in common use among the sightless. Further than this, he organized Home Teaching societies and free libraries for the blind which are now established in many countries; the London society alone during the last forty years has taught 6,000 unfortunates to read and loaned 1,189,000 volumes. Dr. Moon made a special study of languages, and during his fifty-five years of blindness has adapted his alphabet to 476 dialects. He wrote music in the same way and drew geographical and astronomical maps which enabled the blind to study the earth and sky. The life of the "blind philanthropist" has been blessed beyond measure in the good he has acomplished.

The mother of these sprightly little ones knew the value of Ridge's Food—so she has them with her today.

Child Growth (in fact, all growth,) depends upon nourishment. That is the important problem in the critical period of youthful development familiarly known as "growing." The rapidly increasing activity of the vital forces makes a severe demand upon the nutritive powers; and the failure to obtain adequate nourishment often results in a permanently stunted and impoverished physique.

Ridge's Food supplies this need more abundantly than any other known diet. It combines the two requisites of high nutritive value and perfect digestibility to a degree which has made it for thirty years the means of physical salvation to the children and youth of succeeding generations.

The same properties have made it the unfailing reliance of nursing mothers, invalids, convalescents, and all others suffering from weakened or impaired digestion. Sample cans will be sent for 10 cents. If not sold by your druggist write to us.

A pamphlet prepared by a physician of large experience, with invaluable hints for the child and the aged, will be sent to any address mentioning this publication and sending stamps for return postage.

In reply to the open letter of the Railway Age addressed to the United States strike commission, Carroll D. Wright declares many of its statements to be false.

José Salvador Franch, the Spanish anarchist who threw the bomb in November, 1893, killing and wounding many persons, was executed in Barcelona, November 22.

Reports from Australia say that the islands near New Guinea are in a state of revolt; that the natives raided the liquor stores and a wholesale slaughter of whites and a cannibal feast is the result.

THE W. C. T. U. president of New Mexico, Mrs. M. J. Borden, has been ordained as minister of the Congregational church. Two years ago, after passing a satisfactory examination by a council of ministers, she was licensed to preach, but now she has all the privileges of a regularly ordained minister. All honor to the Congregational church, which is the first in this territory to officially and practically recognize equal rights for women in the pulpit!

As a result of the recent election, three women will take their seats in the Colorado House of Representatives at the next session of the State Assembly, and a woman will occupy one of the commodious offices in the new capitol building—that of the State Superintendent of Public Instruction. Considerable curiosity is expressed as to what these feminine officials "will do with their opportunity." As for us, we feel sure that now as in the past, women will be found equal to the occasion.

FOR the first time in the history of the W. C. T. U. the L. T. L's had a representative in its National Convention. This was in accordance with the action of the National last year by which it made constitutional provision that in any state where one thousand Legioners had paid fifty dollars into the treasury they might send a delegate to the "mother" Convention. Pennsylvania is the first to respond and sent Mrs. Sarah B. Knowles. Said the president in introducing her: "It is a beautiful shining good that for the first time we have here, on our twenty-first birthday, a gracious, tender woman with a thousand pledged children at her back, that have put their pennies together and paid them into the treasury and sent up this woman as their representative. Go and do likewise in every one of your states."

IT is with keen regret that we announce the resignation of Miss Alice E. Briggs as office secretary of the World's W. C. T. U. Miss Briggs has served our society so faithfully and in so many capacities that her going will leave a vacancy that will be difficult to fill. Her knowledge of the World's work was particularly valuable, for much of the correspondence has been in her hands. Thousands of our white-ribboners who have never seen her (for she was one of our quiet workers) will be sorry to hear of her resignation. She desires that all official communications, requests for Petition blanks and lists of names to be added to the Great Petition that would otherwise come to her be addressed to Miss Frances E. Willard, The Temple, Chicago, Ill., and that all personal letters be sent to Metamora, Ill., where she will reside for the present.

THE atrocities in Armenia have forced the whole Armenian question to the front and must result in the interposition of Christian nations in the affairs of that part of Turkish domain. Ever since Turkey obtained a foothold in the province there have come periodical reports of fearful outrages upon Armenian Christians by Mohammedans and Europe has had spasmodic awakenings of indignation. Unarmed men and defenseless women and children have been at the mercy of a horde of barbarians and a soldiery whose religion teaches that the slaughter of "Christian dogs" is an act of righteousness, covering a multitude of sins; travelers have reported that there is no security for life, honor or property in that country, and appeals have been made to European powers by Armenians themselves. Still no practical relief was extended. Now the blood of thousands of Christian men, women and children unite with the voices of living Armenians and with humanitarians everywhere in calling upon Europe and America to "do something." Christian nations can no longer remain unmoved and neutral, and without doubt the recent massacre will result in an entire change in the religious and political situation of Armenia. And so once more, not only men but women and children have died in the cause of liberty!

A ST. PAUL brewer has evolved a new idea in advertising which strikingly illustrates the cunningly devised methods of the adversary in attacking the home and recruiting the army of drunkards and criminals. Thirty-five thousand circular letters were mailed in one day to as many homes in that city, calling attention to a certain brand of beer, each enclosing two coupons entitling the holder to "one glass of — beer if presented at any bar." Seventy thousand "treats" and seven hundred dollars worth of postage stamps by one man in one day! We may feel sure he expects no small return for this unusual outlay. No wonder that white-ribboners of St. Paul are indignant that beer should be given away while thousands are crying for bread, and that the United States mails should be the medium through which the husbands and sons of thirty-five thousand homes are lured into saloons. The postal authorities refuse to carry lottery tickets, why should they—it is asked—circulate that which is still more harmful? Why "as a matter of accommodation" to the sender, who desired to have these letters delivered simultaneously throughout the city, "cheerfully coöperate" in this nefarious scheme of brewer and saloon-keepers—as a St. Paul paper, commenting on the efficiency of the service, said they did? It is easy to see why. Most of the internal revenue of this government comes from the liquor traffic. The more beer and whisky sold the more revenue. Government derives no revenue from lottery schemes, but for every barrel of beer manufactured it gets one dollar, and for every gallon of whisky one dollar and ten cents. Why shouldn't liquor sellers expect "accommodations"? Why shouldn't government "cheerfully coöperate" in pushing its own business? We present the beer coupons with these questions at the bar of public opinion.

IN response to an invitation from Salvation Army headquarters members of the Chicago press gathered in the rooms of the Press Club to greet General William H. Booth on his arrival in this city last Thursday morning. The meeting was quite informal, and for over an hour the company of one hundred or more fairly bristled with interrogation points, the questions—some of which the General parried with much shrewdness and wit—embracing a variety of topics, religious, social, political. On the question of legal prohibition it was in his opinion no use to legislate on this, or any other moral question until the people were ready for it. The aim of the Salvationists was to bring about a reformation of the heart, to work from the center outward, and then moral problems would adjust themselves. He did not say how they were to be settled if all people, after they had experienced a change of heart, followed the example of the Salvationists who "as a rule don't vote," nor did he define the word people: presumably he meant voters.

AT the reception given to Commander Booth by the ministers of the city in Willard Hall, every inch of standing room was occupied. The welcoming speech was made by Dr. Goodwin, of the First Congregational church, and it was evident that the distinguished guest was much moved by the warmth of the church's welcome. Recalling, as he doubtless did, the time not many years ago when the churches looked askance at the Salvation Army and its methods, it was little wonder that he should express himself as "overwhelmed and surprised at the number of brethren who had come to greet him." In its first days he had struggled to get its work comprehended by the churches, saying to them, "Put our little boat at the end of your man-of-war," but they were afraid. In reply to inquiry the General gave some account of the work done by the Army in this country, and especially in Chicago, and for a considerable space of time made himself a target for ministerial questioning, as he had earlier in the day for reportorial.

"WELCOME to General Booth, of the Kingdom of Heaven upon Earth." In these words the Rev. Dr. Barrows voiced the greeting of Chicago to the Commander-in-Chief of the Salvation Army. The great Auditorium theater was crowded from pit to dome last Thursday night; Jew and Gentile, Catholic and Protestant, having assembled there to do honor to the "apostle of the poor," the "only British General who has any authority in America." Upon the appearance of the General on the platform the immense audience rose and cheered vociferously with voice and waving handkerchief, while the tambourines, drums and "hallelujahs" of Salvationists added to the enthusiastic welcome. In the address which followed, General Booth briefly outlined the scheme, as given in his book, "Darkest England," prefacing it by a picture of the London slums, especially referring to the rescue work of the "slum angels." His plan is to transfer the inhabitants of the slum districts to farm colonies, and later on—when they have reformed—to some part of the world where territory can be secured which will provide work for all and abundance for all. The basic thought is to help these people to help themselves, to have them coöperate in the work of their own deliverance of body and soul, and herein lies to our minds the chief strength and hope of the General's project. He is undoubtedly right in regarding as the chief fault of present methods of aiding the poor, the looking merely to amelioration of conditions instead of to permanent deliverance. Those classed as "undeserving poor," he says, and says truly, are the ones who most need to be delivered from the bondage of moral and material environment, but instead of this we find that the treatment generally accorded to the criminal class tends to its increase rather than its decrease. The General closed his address with an appeal for financial aid.

A STUDY.

BY WARNER WILLIS FRIES.

In that land of transition, Mexico,
  Imagine a small adobe home,
With mountains above and valleys below,
  Where wife and husband live all alone.
Alone? No, nature's shy myriads dwell
  Above, below, and on either side;
There birds their innocent love stories tell,
  While over far cliffs the wild goats glide.

The husband is dark, and stalwart, and coarse;
  The wife is fair, and slender, and coy.
His voice is as cruel as grim remorse;
  While hers is as winning as newborn joy.
Unto him was given, before his birth,
  A nature morbid, and selfish, and base;
Upon her was bestowed the sterling worth
  And noble traits of a high-born race.

The coins that he prizes are hard and cold,
  He hides them craftily out of sight.
She values the sunset's glittering gold,
  And silver mists born of morning light.
She dreams of wealth in the star-jeweled sky,
  Above the mountains by snow wreaths crowned;
He dreams of the wealth that perchance may lie
  Beneath the mountains, far underground.

She deems that her blessings are very great;
  Thankful is she for flowers and birds;
From morning to night he bemoans his fate
  And longs for increase of flocks and herds.
She thinks of the crosses that many bear
  Of want, and disease, and lives misspent;
He thinks of the crowns that the blessed wear
  And hugs the cross of his discontent.

Like a vine—concealing some crumbling wall—
  Her love a fair robe of charity weaves
His transgressions to cover, one and all,
  While over her slightest fault he grieves.
Though hand in hand they are journeying on,
  From life's high noon to its setting sun;
Though their vows were plighted in youth's fair dawn,
  Can it be proved that the twain are one?

A Mexican home on a small plateau,
  Where mountains are high and skies are blue,
With green valleys smiling way down below;
  This is the picture I paint for you.
Wherein lies my moral? I do not know.
  Yours be the task a moral to find.
Why do weeds and flowers together grow
  In the fertile earth, or prolific mind?

Why do the mountains and plains unite?
  Why do pure streams into foul ones flow?
Why does the snow with its mantle of white
  Cover the filth of the earth below?
Why does the night fold its arms round the day,
  And the white day gladly follow the night?
Why do our souls cling to garments of clay
  If some wise law does not make it right?

MEHETABEL BROWN'S THANKSGIVING.

BY EMMA SEARLES ULRICH.

"It's been the longest, dreariest year of my life by all odds," said Miss Mehetabel Brown, dashing a stray tear from her faded blue eyes, as she meditatively lifted a huge brown potato from the shining basin which she held on her lap and proceeded to pare it.

"What with Lindy's dying and John's going away to college right here in my own house; the Green's, that I'd lived beside nigh onto forty years, takin' it into their heads that they must move into the city and be somebody, and Ruth marryin' as she did and goin' off as a missionary to Feejie or Hottentot; Samantha Ingols, that I've knowed ever since she was Samantha Merrymather, and wore pink calico pinafores to deestrict school, gettin' the Western fever and settin' off with only a week's notice to take up a claim and fight Indians way out in Okelhama, or some such place. Though why she couldn't be content on the neatest little forty acres in all Blair county, that poor Silas slaved so hard for and left her when he died of typhus, is, as I told Eleanor Winner, when we was talkin' it over at the mite society, the day it met at your house, Mis' Williams, a mystery to me, and allus will be. For my part I never was one o' them rovin' kind, and there ain't a citizen in all Brownsville that has stuck any closer than Mehetabel Brown for the past sixty odd years, if I can't vote and do say it as shouldn't.

"The Browns never was of that unstable disposition. There was my great grandfather, Ebenezer Brown; he settled on that eighty just south of the meetin'-house when there wasn't a white man nearer than fifteen miles. He come to stay and he stayed. When he died my grandfather took the same place and I've heard him say he never went beyond the county line but once in thirty years, and that was in lookin' after some stray cattle. Then there was my father, Jacob Brown, no one can say he was any hand to be sky-larkin' over the country. He was one o' them peaceable, home-lovin' men, and like to took a fit when he was subpornied on the jury to Millersburg the time Nat Williams stole them sheep.

"As for Lindy and me, you know as well as I do, we ain't slept outside this house in forty year, exceptin' the time when Cousin Emily was married, and nothin' would do but we must go to the weddin'. It was all fuss and flutter. We never got to bed 'till near midnight, and I like to never closed my eyes to sleep a wink the whole night. Lindy come home the next day with a nervous headache that lasted her until Sunday mornin', and she wouldn't have gone out then only it was communion. But, poor girl, she's sleepin' quiet enough under the snow this winter," and Miss Mehetabel drew a long sigh and brushed aside another tear.

"As I was sayin', Mis' Williams, what with all these changes, to say nothin' of the belfry blowin' off the meetin' house and makin' it look so sort o' squatty, this has been the longest, dreariest year of all my life. To be sure I ain't got anything to complain of so far as crature comforts is concerned," glancing approvingly around the tidy kitchen, and through the open door at the spotless dimity curtains of the best room. "But I don't seem to have no livin' soul to take an interest in, and nobody to take an interest in me, exceptin' Rover and the parrot, and they are both like to die of old age most any day.

"I ain't got no heart to eat nor work. It used to be so cozy like when Lindy and me was here together, she settin' on one side of the table and me the other. I always poured the tea and she dished the sauce. Lindy was good company—sort o' cheerful like, even after she took that hackin' cough that proved the death o' her, as I always said it would if it lasted long enough.

"We was only two old maids, Lindy and me, but we was happy and comfortable. What with the weekly prayer-meetin' rollin' round so often; the mite society and the quarterly meetin' comin off once in three months, and the presidin' elder stoppin' with us on account of the preacher always happenin' to have so many children and bein' scarce o' spare beds, we hadn't much time to be lonesome.

"But it's all changed now Lindy's gone. I turn sort o' sick and faint when I think o' Thanksgivin' comin' on, and I settin' here and eatin' turkey and cranberry sauce all by myself," and Miss Mehetabel, under pretense of rinsing her potatoes, walked to the sink and dried her fast-filling eyes on the snowy towel.

"Mr. Williams and I have thought and talked it all over, Mehetabel," said the little pastor's wife, who had sat half smiling, half weeping, but at the same time busily stitching away on a child's apron during Miss Mehetabel's lengthy discourse. "We both think you ought not to live here alone as you have been doing, when there are hundreds of destitute children who need just such love and care as you are able to give. A child would be a great blessing in your lonely home. Have you ever thought of this, Mehetabel?"

"Strange! But do you know I was thinkin' about that very thing only yesterday. As I was goin' down to the grocery store to buy a pound of tea, I went past Mis' Ellis's old home and there was four o' them children hangin' on the rickety gate, with nobody to care for 'em, and their poor mother off doin' washin' or scrubbin', or anything she can turn her hand to,—so sort o' delicate as she is, too.

"There wasn't a better brought up girl in this whole deestrict than Mirandy Walters. That was her name before she was married. She was sent away to high school one term, too. But she's had a hard row to hoe ever since her poor husband was run over by the steam engine and killed so sudden. I always feel like puttin' my fingers in my ears every time I hear it screech at the crossin' to this day.

"Them children is just as bright as a whip. There's Tildy now, next to the oldest girl. They say there ain't a scholar in the Sunday-school can recite verses to beat her, and her eyes shinin' as black as a coal when she stood up speakin' a piece at the Sunday-school concert. Well, as I was sayin', as I went by there yesterday and see 'em hangin' on that rickety gate, so sort o' forlorn and neglected, somethin' sort o' spoke right to me: 'Mehetabel Brown, you ought to take one o' them children and give 'em schoolin'.

"I turned round sudden, but there wasn't nobody there, but someway I've been thinkin' about it ever since. Then your comin' over this mornin' and sayin' the same thing makes it look to me like an unknown providence.

"Tildy's my choice, and if she'll come I'll take her, and she shan't lack for nothin' so far as this world's goods go.

"If she could only be here by Thanksgiving. But there! I've an idee. Why not have 'em all over here to dinner, and you and Mr. Williams come, too? That would make—let me see—twelve beside myself. The best china wouldn't hardly go 'round. But that doesn't matter. I can eat off one o' them blue plates just as well. Two turkeys ought to do, with plenty of mince pies and cranberry sauce. I've got 'em, too, as fat, sleek turkeys as ever was put on a platter. We could all talk it over then, sort o' quiet, while the children played. It wouldn't be so lonesome as to look forward to settin' down all by myself. I feel more cheery already. But dear, dear, how I have run on! It's quarter to twelve this minute, and these potatoes only half cooked, and you settin' by starvin' for your dinner."

Thanksgiving morning dawned clear and cold without, but within the snug home of Miss Mehetabel Brown there was warmth and comfort. This was to be a great day in her quiet, uneventful life. Preparations had been making for days.

Miss Mehetabel had taken from the upper bureau drawer in the spare bedroom that very morning sundry knitted tidies and mats, together with a pair of highly-colored and embroidered pillow-shams that never saw the light excepting upon state occasions. These, with a huge beaded pincushion, purchased by Miss Mehetabel's grandmother from a genuine Indian princess, and which now rested primly upon the old-fashioned dresser, showed that the occasion in her eyes was one of great and unusual interest.

In the snug pantry all was in readiness. There were rows of mince and pumpkin pies, tender and toothsome; dainty preserves and jellies all ready to "set on," while from the oven of the bright little range in the kitchen proceeded savory odors wondrously suggestive.

Miss Mehetabel herself was arrayed in her best brown merino, carefully protected by a neat white apron. She had hesitated in making her toilet between the ordinary gold breast-pin to fasten her linen collar and a pale green ribbon bow with white lace at the ends, which had been her one piece of extravagance at Cousin Emily's wedding.

"It isn't out of keepin' with this occasion," she murmured softly to herself at last, as the balance turned in favor of the latter. "It brightens me up a bit," and she carefully pinned it on and adjusted the ends. "Thanksgiving only comes once a year at best, and such a one as this but once or twice in a lifetime."

There was a sudden knock at the front door. In walked the preacher and his family, followed by Mrs. Ellis and her little flock, made as presentable as their scanty means would allow.

All was excitement and merry talk, and soon the quiet house rang with the happy laughter of children.

Dinner was dispatched by and by, and what a dinner it was, to be sure—never to be forgotten by certain empty little stomachs.

The great matter was all talked over after dinner, when they were cozily seated in the snug parlor. It was not all news to Mrs. Ellis, for she had received a gentle hint from the little pastor's wife a few days before, and had decided, like the brave, sensible woman she was, to hide the pain of the parting in her own heart and think only of the best interests of her bright little girl.

It was all settled at last, and the children were called in for a parting hymn and prayer. As they knelt together in the gray winter twilight a deep, quiet joy stole into the desolate heart of Mehetabel Brown.

She drew closer to her the little form that knelt beside her, and whispered softly to herself amid her falling tears, "He setteth the solitary in families."

WHAT IT COSTS.

BY HAPPY F. BRANCH.

During the past two years a great deal has been said about "hard times." Last winter the poor of our cities were in want and suffering, while the sympathies and purses alike of the more fortunate ones were taxed to the utmost to relieve even in a small degree the great needs. The financial depression reached to village and hamlet; and it seemed that there was literally no money in the United States.

Under these circumstances it was startling to read the following official statement: "The drink bill of the United States in one year is nine hundred million dollars!"

Think of that; nine hundred millions! Not the dollars and cents of the wealthy classes alone, but of the "poor working man"—many of whom are and have been for months out of employment. It is enough money to have kept all the idle factories running—enough to supply all the destitute men, women and children with the necessities and many of the luxuries of life. It is more than is paid for bread, shoes and stockings, public schools, sugar and molasses, clergymen's salaries, home and foreign missions combined! If you should lay these standard silver dollars on the ground, edge down, you would have three rows reaching from Buffalo to Chicago. Or, if piled one above another, they would make a column which would reach 1,600 miles into the air; more than two hundred and fifty times higher than the highest mountain peak of the world. Twenty-eight thousand, two hundred and ninety-three and a half times higher than the dizzy heights to which the Ferris wheel carried its many passengers.

Imagine this glittering pile of silver as it towers into the air, the topmost dollar of which is far beyond the vision of the naked eye, and what a monument it is! Beautiful, were it raised to commemorate deeds of charity and love—most worthy and inspiring if it spoke of battles for the right. But its story is a far different one. It stands a monument to ruined hopes, darkened homes, wasted lives and blighted ambitions. It represents more bitter tears and sad hearts than all the marble monuments in the "silent cities" of our land. Is it any wonder, then, that there is scarcity of money when such enormous sums are wasted every year? This is what it costs in dollars and cents to furnish the United States with liquor for one year.

And what does this represent in the grain of which the liquor is made? Only this, that five billion pounds annually are used, or eighty-nine and one-fourth millions bushels of fifty-six pounds each. If this grain were put into cars, each car being thirty-four feet in length, it would require two hundred and forty-eight thousand two hundred and fourteen cars to carry it, and would make a train 1,579 miles in length. Estimating this grain to be worth fifty cents per bushel it would sell for $44,125,000.

Go a step farther and convert this grain into flour, and bake it into loaves of bread; it would require seven hundred and fifty bakers, producing five hundred loaves each hour and working ten hours daily during the whole year. To grow the grain would require a field of more than two million acres.

These figures represent the cost in dollars and cents; and also in grain; what other cost is involved? What else does the $9,000,000,000 spent for liquor mean?

Just this, that every year it sends 60,000 people to drunkards' graves, and 200,000 more to the poor-house.

We hear a great deal about the horrors of war and the great loss of life which it occasions; of the anxious hearts and the tears of those who sent fathers and sons to the battle-field. Our hearts almost stand still when we read of the great numbers who have fallen in battle; but read this statement, and comprehend if you can, how "worse than war and pestilence and famine," is this great evil. "In the territory now known as the United States there have been killed during one hundred and fifty years in war, six hundred thousand persons, yearly average four thousand. Rum kills (at a low estimate) fifty thousand yearly, or during the past one hundred and fifty years, seven million five hundred thousand. The great wars of the world for twenty-five years, from 1852 to 1877, including the Franco-German war and our own Civil War, cost a fraction over twelve billion dollars. The cost of intoxicants for the same period in the United States was fifteen billion dollars, or three billion dollars more than all the wars of the world. For every thousand killed in battle rum kills twelve and a half thousand."

What a waste of life! What a squandering of manhood and womanhood, too, these figures represent. Imagine such an army, and what an endless procession it would make were it to pass your door. It is said it requires two million boys from each generation to keep the saloons running, or one boy from every five families; thirty boys from every little settlement of one hundred and fifty families! Think of it! No one can tell with any certainty which five or which thirty it will be that will help swell the two million; but find in any community five boys who smoke and swear, who are lacking in moral courage and true manhood, and they are the ones who will have a better start in the wrong direction than the others.

In the face of such statistics and facts it almost seems as though there is no remedy for the evil. As though it would be impossible ever to put it down or eradicate it. Yet the subject of temperance is gaining ground, surely if slowly, and the next fifty years will see a decrease in these figures. Public sentiment is being roused, children are being educated to work and fight against it, and to win the children to the cause of temperance is to save the world from intemperance. Another and most potent remedy is for each person to adopt as his own the motto,

"I am but one, but I am one,
I cannot do everything,
But I can do something.
What I can do I ought to do,
And what I ought to do
By the grace of God
I will do."

THE ECONOMIC INDEPENDENCE OF WOMAN AND ITS RELATION TO MORALS.*

BY MRS. LYDIA PRESCOTT.

Oliver Schreiner in that prophetic vision of coming Womanhood, "Three Dreams in a Desert," makes Reason say to the woman who has come out of the desert in search of the Land of Freedom, but finds her progress obstructed by a dark, deep river, with banks steep and high: "There is one way and one only to the Land of Freedom; down the banks of Labor; through the waters of Suffering." In answer to her questions, the woman learns that there is no bridge; that the water is deep; that the floor is worn so that her foot may slip at any moment and she be lost; that none have crossed before, though some have tried and their bodies were swept away; that even a track to the water's edge is not yet made. Reason tells her she must not go into the water with the garments she wore in the desert, as she would be dragged down by them and lost. Then the woman gladly throws from her the mantle of Ancient-received-opinion, "worn full of holes," though handed down to her as a priceless inheritance, and with it the girdle from her waist which had been in use so long that "the moths flew out in a cloud." Then said Reason, that old man, "Take the shoes of Dependence off thy feet." And she stood there clad in one white garment on the breast of which was written Truth. On this garment the sun had not often shone, the other clothes had covered it up. Then follows that fearful struggle between love and duty that is the experience of almost every good woman sometime in her life, and her final submission to the voice of Reason. Then the pitiful moan goes up—"For what do I now go to this far off land which no one has ever reached. Oh! I am alone! I am utterly alone!" And Reason said to her, "Silence! what do you hear?" And she listened intently and said, "I hear a sound of feet—a thousand times ten thousand and thousands of thousands, and they beat this way." He said, "They are the feet of those who shall follow you. Lead on! Make a track to the water's edge. Where you stand now, the ground will be beaten flat by ten thousand times ten thousand feet, and over a bridge made of the bodies of those who shall follow you, and will not be washed away in the stream—shall pass?—the entire Human Race."

What is the lesson which this wonderful allegorical picture would teach? Womankind lost in the Desert of Economic Dependence, groping her way back to the Land of Freedom and Equality, "down the banks of Labor; through the waters of Suffering. There is no other way." Her woman's girdle—that emblem of femininity, and for long ages a badge of physical and mental inferiority—must be relegated to the shades of eternal night, along with that venerable mantle of Ancient-received-opinion "worn full of holes." Yet these are but adjuncts of the great underlying cause that has put the burden of subjection upon woman's back, tying it there, as this author has expressed it,—with the broad band of Inevitable Necessity—until she is the creature you find her, the natural product of her conditions; the fruit of an environment for ages—the Ages of Dominion-of-Muscular force,—from which she is now, in this last quarter of the nineteenth century, being slowly emancipated. Her bonds have been cut asunder by the knife of Mechanical Invention and "she knows she might now rise." Her next movement must be to take the "shoes of dependence" off her feet; then will she be ready for her place in life.

That in the annals of time woman once stood noble and free, the recognized equal of man intellectually and economically, ample testimony is to be found in ancient customs, in the early languages, in history and revelation. That it was not man's province in the primitive ages of civilization to assign woman a position inferior to his own, is evidenced by a universal goddess—worship—from time immemorial.

"If all ancient rulers believed in the inequality of the sexes, what led that great king of Egypt, who brought his fabulous land into the comity of nations, to name as his successor—neither of his brilliant sons who had rendered such marked service in his Asiatic conquests—but his one daughter, Hatasu, his counselor in affairs of state, his chief adviser in the work of adorning his great capitol, Thebes, the 'City of Monuments'? 'Twas this woman's brain that evolved the present system of foreign commerce in all of its essential details, and caused to be built a fleet of ships for the purpose, which, laden with gifts for other nations, sailed away as much the wonder of that early age as was the celebrated barge of Egypt's latest queen when obeying the mandate of Rome's Triumvir."

Or what means the story of Deborah, divinely called to take the leadership in her country's emergency; or that careful record concerning Solomon's virtuous woman, to be found in the last chapter of Proverbs?

This perfect woman, a model for all time, so strong, so self-reliant, that husband and children could safely depend upon her in every emergency, was far from the ideal type of a clinging vine, a dependent house-wife. She won her renown, not through her husband's virtues, influence or position, albeit he was a great man, and sat with the elders; not for any riches or honors that were in his power to bestow on his wife; not for the wealth she had herself acquired; but because she had a definite industrial position of her own—an occupation separate and apart from her husband's, over which he had neither jurisdiction nor control; a purpose in life of her own seeking, that promised to make the world a little better for her having lived in it, an industrial occupation that in no manner interfered with the obligations and responsibilities of wife and mother, the sanctity of home, or the claims of humanity. "Her husband," note the phraseology, for that is the relation in which this Jewish elder has come down to posterity, "Her husband sitteth among the elders of the land."

Honored alike, such husband and wife, equals politically and intellectually, economically independent each of the other, may hand in hand tread life's pathway, meet its joys and its sorrows, its duties and its trials, with that calm consciousness of an ideal sympathy and companionship to be found only under conditions of absolute freedom.

Dependence begets an enforced submission to the Power that feeds; and by a law as unvarying as that water finds its level, this submission has in the past restricted woman's energies to a circle of private interests, warped her moral sense, and so weakened her individual will as to render it partially or wholly incapable of carrying out what even the moral sense can see. A paper by Charlotte Perkins Stetson, read before the recent Social Purity Congress, shows clearly the effect of this economic dependence on the tendency to sexual vice. I wish to point out the legitimate effect of such dependence on woman's will and judgment; on her moral sense. To do this, it will be necessary to ascertain how this economic dependence affects her behavior, not only primarily but secondarily.

"The ethics of human life," says Mrs. Stetson, "require a governing personal force standing between cause and effect; a storage of energy to keep action steady when immediate pressure is removed; a power of judgment to decide between acting causes, and move, or refuse to move from ultimate rather than immediate reason. This is called the moral nature."

Unquestionably then, the advance of humanity depends directly upon the ratio in which this moral nature is developed. And because it is now generally admitted that the development of human characteristics as of other forms of life is modified by conditions—by the environment—it behooves the student of ethics to find out what conditions tend most to develop the moral nature. Under what circumstances have men manifested the most rapid growth in moral power and insight? Under conditions of freedom. "Every step in moral growth made by man has been in the direction of freedom or under its influence." No better example of this fact need be named than that volcanic outburst of moral force which settled New England, and which still gives strength and endurance to the American character.

That slavery begets vice and freedom virtue is a fact that rests upon the widest laws of nature. No one expects that virtue and slavery can co-exist. "What is freedom?" Mrs. Stetson answers: "Freedom is the capacity to see what is right—the ability and will to do it—the courage to bear the consequences." That the kind of character which sees right and does it at all costs is only matured in an atmosphere of freedom is one of the most valuable lessons to be drawn from history. When governments require submission and dependence civic virtues are wanting. Where economic systems require submission and dependence, economic virtues are wanting. What then may be said of the moral growth resulting from a life-long and complete dependence of one-half of the civilized world upon the other half, with the case aggravated through countless generations of inheritance? For it is not alone that the economic pressure upon woman compels submission; it is that because of her inheritance of class dependence she cannot rightly judge or strongly act independently of others. Her moral nature is stunted by her environment—her slavery.

In proof of this assertion it can hardly be said that the moral sense is strong when almost every mother will unblushingly admit that she would save her own child at the expense of a score of others. "Maternal instinct," true, but something quite distinct from the moral sense. Is the moral sense strong when almost every woman bears upon her hips, even while admitting the injury to her health, a dangerous weight of skirts too often lying inches deep on floors and pavements, that may sweep up and carry into homes and nurseries germs of stealthy pestilence?

Is the moral sense strong that leads women to spend millions of dollars annually in laces, jewels and idle ornaments in cities where one-fourth of the population are paupers, where thousands of our own sex annually sell their souls for the necessaries of life; where multitudes of children are brought to an untimely grave from hunger and cold? Says Ruskin, "So long as there is nakedness and cold in the land around you, so long will there be no question but that splendor of dress will be a crime."

Can it be claimed that the moral sense is strong when women condemn the same sin a thousand-fold more severely in woman than in man; and for the sake of wealth or position give an innocent daughter to a man of notoriously unclean life—because he consents to make her the last in a long line of degraded women?

If the moral sense were strong in women, think you that society would indulge in the moral turpitude of recognizing a pariah class of women made up of other men's sisters and daughters—a degraded outcast class, spreading disease, insanity, suicide; debasing manhood; contaminating the young; disintegrating the state?

If the moral sense of the mother is what it is painted, do you think she would in this day and age ignore the sacred duty of teaching her sons and daughters the lesson of regeneration under any such specious plea as that "Purity, that lily of God, will grow into perfection in this weedy garden of human life, unplanted, unwatered, untended?" Would she not teach her sons that to take a future wife who is to come to him in the beauty of her unstained purity anything short of the glory of an unfallen manhood, with no shameful secrets to hide, is perfidy in the last degree? That to dishonor the poorest, giddiest, weakest girl, will bring disgrace upon his kindred, his manhood, his unborn sons and daughters?

It is the economic pressure upon woman that has made her what she is. And it is by seeing womanhood apart from ideal virtues ascribed to the sex as a whole that she may ever hope to realize the glorious possibilities opening to her, and properly estimate her value as a source of strength to others through the power and influence of a noble life.

No one expects that the moral sense can be rightly developed in a parasite, or that the kind of character which can see right and do it, at all costs, is nursed in any school but that of Freedom. The economic dependence of woman inevitably increases selfishness, warps judgment, weakens will. The economic freedom of woman will decrease selfishness, balance judgment, strengthen will.

PROTECTION AND FREE TRADE.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The general result of the recent elections is taken as the sincere verdict of the people of the country, as between the above named policies. We may accept it as being commercially righteous, and indulge the hope of returning prosperity.

There is a phase of protection which neither party champions; namely, the protection of the liquor business by our system of license and tax. "You can't fool all the people all the time," and many are aware that license and tax, so far from limiting the traffic in and the evils of rum, actually protect and foster it, as is also true of every licensed privilege. Recently it was said, "If you want to know what party to vote with, read our history of the last thirty years." Possibly the massive majority followed that counsel. On this phase of protection, what is the verdict of that period of our history? Neither party is willing to accept the responsibility for this governmentally-protected free trade in drink, in the presence of its fruits; yet one or both are responsible, for it is part and parcel of our statutes, state and national. Whether it has been high tariff, free trade or reciprocity; greenbacks or specie payment, in war or peace, amid panic or prosperity, still the saloon has flourished and fattened. It might adopt the refrain,

"Tariff may come, and tariff may go,
But I go on forever."

When the political upheaval two years ago put the Democratic party in power, the Republicans consoled themselves by saying that the party in power had also the responsibility. Perhaps the present reflex tide is taken as a sequel to that. As affecting the liquor business, that transfer of party power made no practical difference; for it has continued to enjoy "protection" by the controlling party, and "free-trade" for itself. Now that another swapping of party domination has come, the Democrats can take a dose of consolation from the same bottle to which the Republicans previously had recourse. And how about "the trade"? We wait to see what will be done with the responsibility that comes with power, as pertains to the drink curse.

There is still another kind of "protection," which all people and parties profess to favor, namely, the protection of the virtue and manhood of the country. The protected high tariff (license) saloon makes free trade of the virtue of our daughters and the manhood of our sons. When Judge Lynch metes out speedy justice (?) to the assaulters of chastity—that is the blind rage of the people. When the federal judge legalizes the saloon, which ravishes multiplied thousands of virtue, honor, and all that is sacred—that is the equally blind stolidity of the same people. American philanthropy protects game and fish, protects animals and children from bodily cruelty, protects the aged and indigent from want, but affords no protection against saloon debauchery of our citizenship.

Doubtless the mass of public sentiment favors the protection of the home and opposes the protection of the saloon, yet the saloon flourishes, regardless of party administration and defiant of good sentiment, and homes are blighted thereby. While the "monetary depression" and a year of "tariff tinkering" paralyzed all industries, the saloon ran wide open (usually seven days in a week); also moonshiners, speak-easies, blind tigers, joints, etc., kept officers and courts busy, and the beer keg has wended its way, by wagon or express, to the remotest corners of habitation. Is there not something out of gear or a belt on wrong? The business sense of the country crystallized and effectively rebuked free trade tariff reform. The moral, religious, Christian sense of the people is solid (in fragments) for the protection of home, youth, intellect, virtue from the ravages of the free trade, high protected saloon. Why does it not cement together, as did the commercial sense, and sweep from our land this worst form of free trade, and enthrone in our government this highest kind of protection? American citizenship is proven practically invincible by any foe; who will turn our guns on this foe? When American freemen unite in the chorus, "Down!" to the drink trade, it will be no longer a Banquo's ghost. (REV.) A. S. HUNTER.

CANADIAN METHODIST GENERAL CONFERENCE.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—At the Liverpool district meeting, held in Lunenburg, Nova Scotia, May, 1893, Miss Mary Dauphinee, a worthy member and worker of the Methodist church in Lunenburg, was elected as one of the lay delegates to the Annual Conference at Nova Scotia. When the roll of lay delegates was called at the opening of the Conference at Canso, in June, 1893, Miss Dauphinee's name was challenged, on the ground that a woman could not be a member of the Conference. The Committee on Credentials reported in favor of her eligibility, and the president of the Conference, Rev. E. B. Moore, sustained the decision of the committee in an able ruling, when its constitutionality was challenged. A clerical member of the Conference appealed from this ruling, and a majority of the church Court of Appeal, composed of twelve ministers and twelve laymen, and presided over by the general superintendent of the church, Rev. Dr. Carman, decided that the words "layman" and "laymen," "lay delegate" and "lay delegates" in the written constitution of the church, could not be interpreted to include or mean women. It is worthy of note that a similar restricted interpretation of the wording of the constitution, applied to other parts of it, would prevent women being appointed class-leaders or Sunday-school teachers, and would even shut them out from membership in the church.

The Nova Scotia Conference, at its meeting in June of this year, memorialized the General Conference to adopt legislation to correct this decision of the Court of Appeal, and to place women on an equality with men in all the courts of the church. The General Conference, which met at London, Ontario, in September last, referred this memorial to its Committee on Discipline. The committee, which had nearly, if not quite, two hundred memorials and notices of motion for amendments of the discipline submitted to it, postponed the consideration of this memorial to a late stage of its proceedings, and rejected it by a vote of eleven to nine. The report of the committee was not taken up in Conference till the fourteenth day of its sittings, and was not finally disposed of till the evening of the fifteenth and last day of the Conference. After all its affirmative recommendations had been disposed of, there remained a bundle of scores of memorials respecting which the committee recommended "no action."

On the motion for the adoption of the committee's report as a whole, Judge Chesley, one of the Nova Scotia delegates, moved that it be amended by adding an interpretation clause to the discipline, providing that the words "layman" and "laymen," "lay delegate" and "lay delegates," wherever they occur in the discipline, be interpreted to mean and include women as well as men. The name of Rev. Thomas Marshall, of the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island Conference, appears on the records as seconder of this motion. It is only fair to add that Rev. T. G. Williams, D. D., of the Montreal Conference, and one or two others, expressed their readiness to second it. Judge Chesley supported his motion in a speech of less than five minutes' length, claiming that nearly three-fourths of the members of the church were women, that, outside of the work of the ministers, three-fourths of the work of the church was done by women, and that the Conference ought to put them where God intended them to be, on an equality with men in the church. The hour was late, Conference was about to close, and the motion was put without further debate. The vote was thirty-five for and twenty-nine against. In a full conference it is probable that the proportions would have been about the same. Though the motion was carried by a decided majority, its provisions do not become the law of the church. The Court of Appeal having formally determined that the present constitution excludes women from the conferences, the general superintendent, presiding in the General Conference, ruled that a three-fourths vote was necessary to change the constitution.

As General Conference, the legislature of the church, meets only once in four years, the exclusion must continue till 1898. In the meanwhile, however, there will probably be agitation on the question in the church, and the present majority in favor of the admission of women is likely to grow to such proportions during the next four years as to sweep away the time-worn restrictions by more than a three-fourths majority. CORRESPONDENT.

MAINE REPUBLICANISM AGAIN.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The position of the Republican party in Maine, in relation to prohibition, is precisely that which it has held in Iowa and Kansas. To gratify the large number of temperance men in the party, they have given nominal support to the principle in their platforms, and at the same time permitted open violation of the law they professed to uphold. The attitude of the Republican party in Maine towards prohibition is a far greater menace to the law than that of the Democratic party. The resubmission plank of the Democratic party is doing far less to create resubmission sentiment than the open saloons that are running with the sanction of Republican government, and often with the patronage of Republican officials. At Union Station restaurant, in Portland, within a mile of Neal Dow's home, wines are advertised on every menu, and all kinds of drinks freely served, with the full knowledge and consent of Republican officers whose duty it is to enforce the law. One congressional district in Maine has for years been represented by a notoriously intemperate man, and this year he was reëlected by a majority of over six thousand votes. And yet we are told that the Republican campaign in Maine was fought on the issue of prohibition as truly as upon the tariff. There are men in the Republican party in Maine who are staunch supporters of prohibition, and the Prohibition party has not commended itself to the judgment of the people, by refusing to support Nelson Quigley, and other men of like standing on the Republican ticket, who personally represent the very principles for which we contend. But the party in Maine, with rare exceptions, is officially for the protection of the violators of the prohibitory law. It was for that reason that Neal Dow left the Republican party.

If it should be argued that at the present stage of temperance education it is impossible to obtain practical support of prohibition in any dominant party, and that the best interests of good government are served by supporting the Republican party, the proposition would not be inconsistent in itself. But to urge the support of the Republican party in Maine on account of its attitude toward the saloon, when it is the party in the state that receives the largest liquor vote, and towards whose campaign funds the violators of the law contribute most, is manifestly inconsistent with the principles of our organization.

TEMPERANCE ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—All through my tarry in Antwerp my interest in learning everything possible about the Congo natives had taken much of my time and thought. I had learned of Captain Dhanis' conquest over the Arabs. I had seen his triumphs on his return, and the chains that King Leopold's agents in Africa have broken from the arms and feet of the poor natives and set them free. All that I have witnessed, but no one seemed to tell me much of the enlightenment of the souls of the poor Congolaises, and whether they readily and completely had given up their worship of idols and had sincerely embraced, as a nation, the Christian faith. I had seen, it is true, a little model of a Christian church in the Congo exhibit, but how many attended that church in Africa, and how many others were there, no one could tell me. It was my good fortune, however, in an unexpected manner, to gain information in regard to the religious conditions of the Congo tribes that I feel can be relied upon for authenticity, as this came from the lips of a missionary of the Methodist Episcopal church, who was returning to his native land after a continued and arduous labor among these Congo natives that has extended over a period of eight years. This missionary speaks as if the great crying evil amongst the natives was liquor; even children of tender years are drunkards, and a great hindrance to the eradication of this evil is "that some of the missionaries will take their drink and cigars." Of course my informant did not intend to advance the idea that the teachers of the gospel truths drank to intoxication; but as the savages in many things are like children, how could they tell where to draw the line and say to themselves, stop? Hence, this violation of temperance principles by these teachers of Christianity renders null and void all their lessons, leaving the poor savages bound, soul and body, in the chains of drunkenness, fetters worse than those of their taskmasters—the Arabs. Can not the W. C. T. U. do something in the way of a suggestion that these ministers of the gospel not only preach but practice temperance?

Before turning down the leaf of my investigations in Belgium's reforms I must mention the one which has received a great deal of attention, namely, the prisons. I learned from Mr. La Fontaine, the secretary of the Peace Congress, that they have there long ago given up the promiscuous association of criminals of the worst kind with others who are less steeped in iniquity. They have adopted the plan of isolation in the incarceration of criminals. Mr. La Fontaine said there was an attempt being made to shorten the time of incarceration where there was an evident reform in the life. They are also going to try the plan of letting criminals, after a certain time, go out to work for the day and return at night to the prison, so as to be sheltered from temptation.

In all that I saw in Belgium there is an effort to be in the front ranks of moral influences except there is the crying evil of intemperance. So determined is the effort to make every one imbibe something in the way of strong drink that I found when I refused beer in a restaurant they then made me pay thirty or thirty-five centimes for a little glass jar of water. When I bid good-bye to Holland and Belgium and, after a night's journey was safely landed in old England, it seemed following out the same trend of thought to meet (among my first friends encountered in England) Mr. William Tallack, of the Howard Association, who devotes so much of his time to prison reforms, and Rev. Dr. Evans Darby, the secretary of the London Peace Society, who devotes all his time to the promulgation of peace sentiments and whatever work will better the condition of humanity.

Mr. Tallack had just returned from Belgium, where he had been visiting the prisons on a tour of inspection. He confirmed what I have written in this letter, but also gave me some facts that I had not gleaned. He told me the great reformer in this particular was a Monsieur Ducpetiaux. For some technical (or political) offense he had unjustly been imprisoned; when his innocence was established and he was liberated, as a sort of compensation for his unjust incarceration King Leopold I. offered him a position of honor, leaving it for the gentleman himself to choose what the honor should be. Monsieur Ducpetiaux chose that of inspector general of Belgian prisons, for he wished to reform many of the evils that he had there witnessed by bitter practical experience. With this position most readily granted him by his sovereign, he went most cautiously and methodically to work to correct the penal system. He caused to be circulated among all prisoners the fact that he wished to know what their sentiments were about what they most desired to have improved while they were prisoners. The majority of the complaints from the criminals who had committed lighter offenses were, "that they were obliged to associate with the lowest class of sinners, and listen to all their vile conversation and instigations to more crimes." The inspector general of prisons had himself bitterly passed through that experience, and he lost no time in eradicating the evil, and also added the employment of good influences to be brought into the lives of culprits. The prison at Brussels, Mr. Tallack tells me, is the best arranged in the world.

Lady Henry Somerset is everywhere looked upon with the greatest love and respect by all her countrymen and her countrywomen.

I visited Westminster Abbey yesterday and looked upon the Poets' Corner. The marble bust of our own loved Longfellow is near the grave of England's poet-laureate. James Russell Lowell's memorial window is full of history, and is a magnificent tribute of esteem and love paid by England to our American ambassador.

When poets and philanthropists thus girdle the world with the links of human brotherhood (that even death cannot shatter) it seems we are but a little way off from the day when wars shall be no more.

Looking at Longfellow's marble statue yesterday my lips involuntarily repeated the words that his pen had written:

"Down the dark future, through long generations,
The echoing sounds grow fainter, then cease,
And like a bell, with solemn, sweet vibrations,
I hear the voice of Christ say, PEACE!"

PROHIBITION WOMEN POINT THE WAY.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—I think I express the sentiments of a majority of your readers in saying that I rejoice you have set forth in your columns so logically and clearly the vexed question of prohibition partisanism. Experience in local W. C. T. U. work has shown me that white-ribboners are ofttimes perplexed by what appears to be the conflicting interests of party prohibition on the one hand and pending reforms in city or state on the other. They often find it difficult to reconcile the duty of the hour regarding opportunities presented by their own particular environment and duty as loyal white-ribboners toward the party to which the W. C. T. U. "lends its influence."

The mite of political power which it was the privilege of the women of Illinois to exercise in the late election brought this difficulty prominently to the front, and serves to illustrate the principle involved—for we cannot emphasize too much the fact that it is loyalty to principle and not loyalty to party, however good, which must be the mainspring of all political action if the unclean "pool" we hear so much about is ever to be really and permanently purified.

Hence it seems to me a matter of regret that women of Illinois with their tiny wedge of a ballot should have chosen to work along the lines of partisan organization, and I am glad that prohibition women didn't do so. The big Republican and Democratic women's mass-meetings in Chicago naturally suggested the question which was often asked, "When are you prohibition women going to have your rally?" The fact that they omitted all such demonstrations argues well for the future of this progressive young party. It indicates, not that the prohibition woman is behind the women of other parties in political push, as has been charged, but that she has a higher ideal of "politics" than her more partisan sisters.

Without doubt, thousands of the votes received by the Republican and Democratic candidates for university trustees were cast by prohibition men and women, who voted thus because they believed that the election of three women on this important board would best serve the educational interests of the state. Now, isn't this true political honesty and wisdom—true "science of government"? If women had been able to vote the entire state ticket, as in Colorado, the case would have been different, but in this instance no prohibition principle was at stake. In fact, who can doubt that upon any question which might arise pertaining to prohibition in university affairs Mrs. Flower and Mrs. Smith would stand as squarely against any compromise with the liquor traffic as the most radical Prohibitionist on or off the state ticket?

I have held the belief that a part of woman's mission in politics was to aid in securing good government by standing as the foe of partisanism, and that her influence would bring about a radical change in political methods all along the line. And, notwithstanding the formation of Republican and Democratic women's clubs, as long as Prohibition women lead the way (as in Illinois) I see no reason for changing my belief. The timely discussion in THE UNION SIGNAL and the position taken by it, will, I feel sure, check the tendency among its constituency to drift into a partisanism such as was never intended by the "party resolution."

I was sorry that the Democratic nominee, for whom I have a very high regard, said that she did not want to be elected if the rest of the ticket was defeated, that she preferred to go down with her party. If the mere triumph of the individual were the only consideration this would be a laudable sentiment indeed, but it was not the interests of one candidate, but the interests of the people of Illinois which were involved, for it cannot be denied that, for the good of the institution and the youth of the state, of twelve university trustees more than one should be a woman. The success of any one party as such is as nothing compared with the welfare of the commonwealth.

THE CAUSE IN MEXICO.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—It may be some of your readers will be interested in a brief letter concerning temperance work in this distant country. I have been circulating the Great Petition and hoped to have had a hundred names, but as there are few here who have any idea of the signification of the words temperance or prohibition, my ambition has not been met. Every house has its sideboard well stacked with wine; every block contains one or more places where liquors are sold; every doctor prescribes wines and every one considers wine more essential than water at the dinner table, and the person who refuses it commits an unpardonable act of rudeness.

Temperance work here began in 1882. We used Mrs. Hunt's Temperance Physiologies in schools as soon as I could translate enough to be partly understood; we soon had the temperance charts. Our pastor labored with the congregation in sermons and talks, until in 1886 we thought the ground was ready for a temperance society, which was formed with twenty members, increasing later to forty-five. If I am not mistaken this was the first temperance society in Mexico. We now have a temperance circle which meets once a week whose members are women and girls over twelve. Its object is to obtain information regarding the effect of alcoholic drinks; of the work of women for the cause of temperance in other lands. There are only twenty-five members and we but just organized this last summer. This is only as a drop of cold water sentiment in a land burned to a desert by fiery drinks; but God grant it may be the beginning of a stream that shall bless and save many.

REPORT OF TEMPLE TRUSTEES.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE, PRES.

National W. C. T. U. Convention, Cleveland, O., 1894.

Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in mine house, and prove me now herewith, saith the Lord of hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it.—Mal. 3:10.

A year and a half of unprecedented financial distress is drawing to a close. Thousands of business enterprises have been hopelessly wrecked, and those that were founded on the soundest financial basis have had all they could do to weather the storm. Lack of confidence has almost made shipwreck of the entire business of the country. Such widespread business disasters never before have been known. Under such circumstances, it is not surprising that the Temple interests should have suffered severely. All we have been able to do during this period is to pay the interest on the Temple Trust Bonds and hold on to what we have. The receipts from October 1, 1893, to October 1, 1894, were $17,135.99. In addition we have received a bequest of $1,800 from Mr. Samuel Simpson, of West Washington, which is payable in 1895. This is quite a large falling off from the two previous years. Of the $17,135.99, Mr. W. O. Grover, of Boston, Mass., gave $2,000 in Temple Trust Bonds, and Mr. Henry H. Faxon, Quincy, Mass., $1,000 in Trust Bonds. The cash value of these bonds is over $3,000. At the beginning of the year, realizing that a terrible crisis was upon the country, and in order to secure sufficient funds to meet our interest on bonds, we felt we must offer some added inducement in order to have people give. We promised all persons who would place $3.65 in the Temple mite-box during 1894, the gift of a beautiful silver souvenir Temple tea-spoon. This has resulted in 4,000 persons sending for a mite-box. About 400 have already sent back the contents of their boxes and claimed the spoons. This leaves 3,600 to be heard from before the 1st of January. If the contents of these mite-boxes are all returned, it will aggregate $13,140, and will swell the receipts of the year greatly. Besides, it will enable us to meet the interest on the January Temple Trust Bonds, and pay other necessary expenses. There has been a floating debt of $65,000 on the Temple. The dividends from rentals have been applied to this. By the 1st of January we will have paid off $40,000 of this indebtedness, leaving a balance of $25,000 to be paid the coming year. The following year the Temple Trustees will be drawing dividends on $306,000 worth of stock. This will soon make up for the interest we are now paying out on Temple Bonds. Business failures have caused the cancelling of about $40,000 worth of leases in the Temple during the past year and a half. Our rent roll is now $156,000. It can be seen from this that it would have been $196,000, and probably much more, if the times had not been so disastrous.

However, a brighter day is dawning. Business has improved wonderfully. We have been watching and waiting for this a long time in order to go out in an aggressive campaign to secure funds for the Temple. In fact, we made an attempt early last spring in this direction. At the request of the Temple Trustees I undertook to see what could be done, and made a trip to the Pacific Coast. I had many promises of aid as soon as times should change for the better. I secured one pledge of $50,000, another of $10,000, and others of smaller amounts. I saw, however, that the times were entirely unpropitious to insure the full success of such an undertaking. For instance, one generous man to whom I applied in Boston for $10,000, said, "I would gladly give you that amount, and will do so as soon as times are better, but my income at present is so cut off I fear I have pledged more now than I can meet." He gave me, however, $2,000, which I have already reported. With brightening skies overhead, I intend again this winter to resume the campaign started last March.

In last year's report, I asked for two years' time to secure the necessary funds to set the Temple free and make it ours. I hope much can be done towards this the coming year, but if it cannot be completed, the past year of disaster ought not to count, and I should be allowed still another year to complete the undertaking. In the meantime I shall ask my white-ribbon sisters to sustain the enterprise in the same manner they have in the past, and I trust by the expiration of two years the burden will be entirely lifted from their shoulders.

Massachusetts is the banner state this year, as the $3,000 given by Mr. Grover and Mr. Faxon, added to smaller individual gifts, with returns from unions, foots up $3,773.48.

Total receipts from states and individuals	$17,135.99
Balance on hand Oct. 1, 1893	621.90
	$17,757.89

Besides this, we hold a note already referred to for $1,800 from Mr. Samuel Simpson, of West Washington. This note is secured by amortgagepaying 10 per cent. interest; it will mature in 1895.

We expended during the thirteen months ending November 1, 1894	$14,995.99
Cash balance on hand November 1, 1894	574.77
Notes receivable	2,187.13

The Columbian Publishing Company has made us a very generous offer, which has appeared in the "Temple Items" column in THE UNION SIGNAL several times. If the unions take it up, as they are promising to do, it will pay both them and us well, without any outlay to either. We hope a nice sum by Christmas may be realized from this source.

We are bringing out a little book of the Temple, with full description, embellished with about thirty engravings in half-tone, sketches of rooms and different points of beauty and interest in the building. It promises to be a little gem. It will be sold for twenty-five cents. We hope to have it ready for delivery by the Christmas holidays.

With unwavering trust and a faith undaunted, we shall continue our efforts to free our "House Beautiful" from debt, believing firmly that He who issued the call to "arise and build" will complete that which was begun at His command.

LOSSES.

Upon the white sea sand
There sat a pilgrim band,
Telling the losses which their lives had known,
While evening waned away
From breezy cliff and bay,
And the strong tides went out with weary moan.

One spake with quivering lip
Of a fair freighted ship,
With all his household to the deep gone down.
But one had wilder woe,
For a fair face long ago,
Lost in the darker depths of a great town.

There were some who mourned their youth
With a most loving truth,
For its brave hopes and memories ever green,
And one upon the West
Turned an eye that would not rest,
For far-off hills whereon its joy had been.

Some talked of vanished gold,
Some of proud honors told,
Some spake of friends that were their trust no more;
And one of a green grave,
Beside a foreign wave,
That made him sit so lonely on the shore.

But when their tales were done,
There spake among them one,
A stranger, seeming from all sorrow free.
"Sad losses have ye met,
But mine is heavier yet,
For a believing heart hath gone from me."

"Alas!" these pilgrims said,
"For the living and the dead,
For fortune's cruelty, for love's sure cross,
For the wreck of land and sea,
But howe'er it came to thee—
Thine, stranger, is life's last and heaviest loss."

TO THE RESCUE.

BY HANNA A. FOSTER.

"A child lost! every man to the rescue!" was the cry which startled the inmates of Wesley Hulet's log cabin one morning in the early spring of 1830.

The man who had so excitedly announced his errand had come from Columbia, Lorain county, Ohio, to Abbeville, Medina county. His horse was reeking with sweat; every moment was precious. A few hurried sentences sufficed to tell the story.

A little boy, six or seven years of age, had left his home the previous morning to go to the sugar camp where his brothers were boiling down sap. When the brothers returned home at evening, and it was learned that he had not been to the sugar camp at all during the day, there was a scene of sore distress and wild excitement. Hickory torches were soon aflame, and out into the night sped fleet-footed messengers to arouse the neighbors, most of whom were miles away. In an incredibly short time a rescue party was formed and a definite plan of procedure adopted.

If any one should find the child a signal gun was to be fired, three shots in quick succession if alive, two, if dead, and those of the party within hearing were to respond, each by a single shot, thereby passing the news along till it should reach the entire party. The dense forests were at that time infested with bears, wolves and wildcats, and the treacherous wail of the panther was sometimes heard in the vicinity of the clearings. The lost child was poorly clad; his jacket and trousers of coarse homespun were old and patched, and his feet were bare, for shoes, especially for children, were luxuries not easily attainable.

Hour after hour men and boys with the kindliness and courage which characterized the pioneers of those times, carrying their loaded guns and followed by their faithful dogs, made their way through brush and bramble, up and down hills, crossing gullies and wading ice-bordered creeks, too full of neighborly sympathy and anxiety to take any note of danger or fatigue. So passed the night. Morning came, and the signal gun had not been fired.

According to previous agreement the men gathered at the home of the nearly distracted parents, partook of simple refreshments, held a brief consultation, sent to adjoining townships for reinforcements, and then, with even more intensity of purpose went forth to renew the search.

Late in the afternoon, as one of the men was picking his way around a fallen tree he was halted by a plaintive cry and the words: "Mr. Warner, have you anything to eat in your pocket?"

Bang! Bang! Bang! Found and alive, rang out the blessed tidings. At once, from all quarters were heard the answering guns until the wide old forest was vocal with joy.

Yes, the poor child, cold and hungry, his little bare feet, limbs and hands cruelly torn and swollen, was found and alive.

No wonder his sister fainted and his mother was so paralyzed with joy that she could neither move, speak nor weep, when he was tenderly brought to them. Nor was it strange that as the good news flew from cabin to cabin throughout the settlement, it prompted both merrymaking and devout thanksgiving.

Two generations ago! That little boy, if still living, is an old man. The unutterable anguish of those who loved him, the neighborly sympathy and heroic efforts in his behalf are all of the past.

But have there been no lost children in Columbia or elsewhere during the last sixty-four years? Boys and girls from other than log-cabin homes, who have wandered out in their sweet springtime and found, whichever way they turned, in city or country, the allurements of vice, the drinking customs of society, and always and everywhere the open saloon? Have not thousands and thousands of such been so cruelly wounded, bewildered and discouraged that they have never found their way home?

We see them every day, hungry of heart, deserted by friends, their fortunes wasted, characters scarred, and hopes for time and eternity blasted.

If every mother could but feel her boy's danger. If every intelligent citizen and wise statesman would but hear and heed the cry, "The children of the Republic are being lost—everybody to the rescue!" how the torchlights of truth would flash through the wilderness of sin, not only for the rescue of those already astray, but for the discovery and destruction of society's most deadly foe, the saloon.

Then might the drink curse be banished from our beloved land, and the paths to happiness, usefulness and honor be made safe and pleasant for little feet.

God give us men good enough and brave enough to say by word and deed, "the children shall not be lost."

DIFFICULTIES IN LOCAL UNION WORK.

BY MRS. C. M. VAN VALKENBURGH.

The difficulties in W. C. T. U. work are many and disheartening. But it is well to call them up and look them boldly in the face trying to find their remedy.

One of these difficulties lies in the fact that so comparatively few people are willing to join the W. C. T. U. By their inactivity they encourage the enemy and place obstacles in the worker's pathway. There are Christians who do not so much as "sympathize with all well-directed efforts for temperance"; ministers who dislike or refuse absolutely to read W. C. T. U. notices from the pulpit; editors who reject temperance items carefully prepared for their use; Sunday-school superintendents who will not use papers and pledge-cards provided by the local unions; and Christian women, "who would join if they had any influence."

Is there any way of gaining these as co-workers?

They may be reached by the silent influence of printed truths; they may come in direct and sad contact with the demon of drink and answer to the "arrest of thought." Some must be reached through one influence, some through another. Behind all must ever be the power of the Holy Spirit in prayer and purpose.

Unpaid dues is a serious hindrance to successful work. An annual statement, written, printed, type-written, or mimeographed, as circumstances permit, sent to each member of the union, would, in most cases, insure attention to the financial side of the work. The mere reading in the annual meeting of the treasurer's report cannot be as effective as the same truths, in black and white, facing the individual members.

The president of the local union, on whom the largest share of work done usually rests, often finds it hard to arrange for the monthly, semi-monthly, or weekly meetings of the union, and save them from monotony or profitlessness. Why not adopt the topic-card system, with topics and leaders' names printed for three or six monthsahead?

Again, there are societies and societies, and active women are heavily burdened by their demands. Impress upon all who can be reached by word or pen the needs of the W. C. T. U. Christian women should choose between the calls of these various organizations. The ones that have for their object the uplift of the world, that need help, that have the fewest adherents, should be reinforced from the ranks of women who can serve. Some of these women must be, judiciously and lawfully, entrapped or attracted at first. For bees, set out honey; for birds, grain; for fish, their diet. Employ diverse means to advertise the cause of temperance and the work of the W. C. T. U.

Perhaps the greatest material difficulty of all is the lack of funds. The W. C T. U. should have the best speakers, hire the best halls (or build their own), distribute literature broadcast, "enlarge its borders and strengthen its stakes." The work done by the department of systematic and proportionate giving is one way of solving the money problem. One who does not give systematically can never know how much of pleasure comes from having a Lord's purse into which to drop His portion. Systematic giving, if practiced consistently by all followers of Christ, would solve many perplexities and hasten the coming of the kingdom of righteousness.

Everything worth having lies beyond the Hill Difficulty. "He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment." "And they overcame by the blood of the Lamb and by the word of their testimony, and they loved not their lives unto the death."

LIFE'S SECOND CHANCE.

If we had but one chance in life it would fare badly with most of us. We do scarcely anything perfectly the first time we try to do it. Nearly always do we fail. Not many lives are lived beautifully, without a break or lapse, from childhood to age. If, therefore, the opportunity of choosing good came to us only once, and was then forever withdrawn, few of us would make anything of our life.

In Florence, one of the treasures of art admired by thousands of visitors is Michael Angelo's representation in marble of the young David. The shepherd boy stands with firm foothold, the stone grasped tightly in his right hand, ready to be sped on its holy errand. When the statue was unveiled three hundred and fifty years ago, it caused an unparalleled sensation among all lovers of art. It is, indeed, a marvelous piece of sculpture.

But the strangely winning thing in the story of that statue is, that it was the stone's second chance. A sculptor began work on a noble piece of marble, but, lacking skill, he only hacked and marred the block. It was then abandoned as spoiled and worthless, and cast aside. For years it lay in a back yard, soiled and blackened, half hidden among the rubbish. At last Angelo saw it, and at once perceived its possibilities. Under his skillful hand the stone was cut into the fair and marvelous beauty which appears in the statue of David. Yet it is said that the completed work is not quite perfect; that because of the first cutting of the stone the final result is marred.

There is an impression among some people that a man is a better man after having tasted sin, after knowing evil experience, then repenting, being forgiven and restored. This is a mistaken impression. Innocence is far better than penitence. Penitence is infinitely better than despair, but a life is never so beautiful after sin's fires have swept over it as it would have been if it had been kept untarnished and had realized God's first thought for it.

. . . . . .

There is no doubt there is a work possible to those who have been hurt in sin's battle and have been lifted up again which they never could have done without the sad experience through which they have passed. John B. Gough never could have pleaded with such burning eloquence for temperance, as he did for so many years, if he had never himself known from experience the terrible bitterness of the curse of strong drink. His own life was marred by the dissipation which marked his earlier years, and which dragged him down into debasement; and he could never win the nobleness and beauty which would have been possible to him if he had never so failed and sinned against himself. But he took his second chance when the first was lost forever, and grew into great strength of character and into abounding usefulness. It is even doubtful if he would ever have made so much of his life had it not been for the losing of its first chance and the imperiling of all, which wrought afterward in him as such mighty motives, impelling him to such heroic life and such noble service for his fellow men.

We should rigidly train ourselves to make the most we can of every chance in life that comes to us. But when we have failed we should not spend a moment in regret; for regret is vain and useless, and only helps to eat away the strength that remains. We should turn instantly and with resistless energy to the saving of what is left. There is always another chance, even down to the life's latest moment in this world.—J. R. Miller, D. D., in "The Building of Character."

A WISE and holy rule for our neighbor's faults is this: To speak of them to God, and forget them before men.—Massillon.

BE OF GOOD COURAGE.

Here's a hand to the boy who has courage,
To do what he knows to be right!
When he falls in the way of temptation,
He has a hard battle to fight.
Who strives against self and his comrades
Will find a most powerful foe;
All honor to him if he conquers,
A cheer for the boy who says "No."

There's many a battle fought daily
The world knows nothing about;
There's many a brave little soldier
Whose strength puts a legion to rout.
And he who fights sin single-handed,
Is more of a hero I say;
Than he who leads soldiers to battle
And conquers by arms in the fray.

Be steadfast, my boy, when you're tempted
And do what you know to be right;
Stand firm by the colors of manhood
And you'll overcome in the fight.
"The right," be your battle cry ever
In waging the warfare of life;
And God, who knows who are the heroes,
Will give you the strength for the strife.

NO MATTER WHERE WE STAND.

Upon the crowded field of life,
With daily deed and word,
We gather, in a mighty host,
To glorify the Lord.

To glorify His gracious name,
Our Saviour and our King,
And to fulfill our glorious task,
Our noblest powers we bring.

And some are where the world looks on
With wonder and delight,
And some in dim unnoticed nooks
Are almost hid from sight.

Yet we are working, heart with heart—
We labor, hand with hand,
And so we honor Jesus Christ
No matter where we stand.

No matter though no friendly eye,
Our humble toiling view;
No matter though no loving voice
Commend the work we do.

If only we the part fulfill,
That Christ, our Lord, has given,
Be ours the humblest place on earth,
The lowest seat in heaven.

DIDN'T BELIEVE IN IT.

A TRUE STORY.

Ray is a little friend of mine who lives in a small town away out in Kansas. He is only about ten years old, but he knows right from wrong much better than some people seem to who are a great deal older. He doesn't believe in even looking at anything wrong.

One day he and his little brother Lee had to go to the barber's alone. Now, back of the barber's shop there was a room used as a billiard hall and saloon, or what in Kansas is called a "joint." Of course, it was not a very good place for two little boys to go alone, but there was no one to go with them, and Ray's mamma can trust him anywhere, as you will agree when you have read this story. They walked into the barber's shop hand in hand, and Ray said:

"If you please, sir, Lee and I would like to have our hair cut."

"All right, my little man," said the barber, pleasantly. "Get right up into this chair, and it will be done in a jiffy."

Ray started to climb into the high chair, but stopped when he noticed that the door leading into the back room was open, and that several men were there, playing billiards. The chair was set facing the door, and Ray saw at a glance that he would be sitting where he could not help seeing them all the time his hair was being cut. It did not take him long to decide what to do. Turning to the barber, he said politely:

"Please turn this chair around the other way."

"Turn it around? What for?" asked the man in surprise.

"I don't want to sit in it that way," answered Ray. "Will you please turn it?"

"Well," said the man, good-naturedly, "I don't mind turning it if you'll give me a good reason for it. Why don't you want to sit in it this way?"

"Because," said our little man, straightening himself up and speaking in a clear, decided tone, "those men in there are playing billiards. I don't believe in it, and I don't want to see them."

The barber laughed heartily. But he was a good-natured, accommodating man, and he took hold of the chair—which was not a large, heavy one, such as you are in the habit of seeing in the city, but light and easily moved—and turned it around.

"There, now," he said, giving Ray a lift, "how's that?"

"That's better, thank you," said Ray, seating himself, and waiting patiently while the barber tied the big apron around his neck, and then began to snip, snip, with his scissors.

"There!" said the barber, when the hair was nicely cut and shampooed, and he had taken off the big apron and given Ray's clothes a good brushing, "now we are ready for this little man," turning to Lee.

"Hold on a minute, though," he said, as Lee was about to climb into the big chair, and, taking hold of it, he was about to wheel it around to its place again, perhaps thinking it would make no difference to a little fellow like Lee.

But Ray sprang forward quick as a flash, and laying his hand on the arm of the chair, said:

"No, sir; leave it that way, please."

"Why, what for?" said the man, in a tone of surprise. "What difference does it make to Lee?"

"Because," said Ray, stepping close, and speaking in a confidential tone. "Because he don't believe in it, either!"

I hope Ray will always turn his back on anything that he believes is wrong-doing, or that may lead to wrong-doing, don't you?—Sunday-school Times.

A MODEL YOUNG MAN.

A good old gentleman, who was strongly opposed to tobacco chewing and to liquor drinking, met a lady friend in a car recently, and their conversation was as follows:

"Have you any children, madam?"

"Yes, sir; a son."

"Ah, indeed! Does he smoke?"

"No, sir; he has never as much as touched a cigarette."

"So much the better, madam; the use of tobacco is a poisonous habit. Does he frequent the clubs?"

"He has never put his foot in one."

"Allow me to congratulate you. Does he come home late?"

"Never. He goes to bed directly after dinner."

"A model young man, madam, a model young man. How old is he?"

"Two months."

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—Puzzles again! You were all so interested in our last chat about puzzles, that I was sure many of you would be ready for the next talk on that interesting topic, and so without delay will start right in.

Pi, pi! Next to numerical enigmas our Soft-Shelled Nuts would alternate with pi, so many of our boys and girls indulge in this form of puzzle-making. Some of you look a little curious. No, it is not pi-e that you eat. This pi is taken from the printer's word which means a mixing up of type. You would understand what it means if you could see the expression on the face of the young lady who sets this type when her "stick" becomes pi. Little brother's house of blocks often becomes "pied" when teasing big brother comes along.

This is the way to make pi—this kind of pi: Take a good quotation, proverb, or motto, and mix up the letters of each word as badly as possible; for instance, Onslaos tums og (saloons must go.)

Anagrams are pi excepting that the mixed letters must form another word, or a sensible sentence. For instance, the name of the noble Prohibitionist, Neal Dow, makes the good anagram, Down ale! And the stirring call, War! call friends! has been made from the well known name, Frances Willard. Some of the wisest heads in many lands have enjoyed this play of anagrams, and I would advise our advanced pi makers to turn their attention to it during their social winter evenings.

I think that I enjoy definition puzzles more than any other, because you must exercise your wits most carefully, an exercise that helps your knowledge. There is a great variety of this kind of puzzle, but I will only have space for one:

An acrostic is formed when the combined initials of the defined words form a word, thus:

My first is something we never drink (Wine)
My second is a fermented beverage we refuse (Ale)
My third is that which "cheers but does not inebriate" (Tea)
My fourth is a mixed drink spoiled by spirits (Eggnog)
My fifth is an intoxicating liquor made from the scum of former distillations or from molasses (Rum)
My initials form the name of the drink whose praises we sing. (WATER)

A double acrostic is formed when both initials and finals are used; for example:

My first is a high place (ToweR)
My second means more than (ExtrA)
My third is to sorrow (MourN)
My fourth is fear (PaniC)
My fifth is the bird of freedom (EaglE)
My whole spells that for which we labor.

In giving your definitions, while keeping strictly to the meaning, aim to lead the guesser into a search for the right word.

If you like, we will have more puzzle descriptions later on. Yours,

Aunt Jane

NEPHEWS AND NIECES.

I thought I would write and tell the cousins about the entertainment our L. T. L. had a week or two ago. We had pieces and songs and made ten dollars. We decided to give half of it to the Sunday-school for song books, and with the other half we are going to buy song books and a book with pieces and dialogues and some badges and pins for some new members, and for some that had lost theirs. GROVER DRUMMOND.

Minnewaukon, N. D.

That ten dollars is going to do a good deal, I think Congratulations from Cozy Corner to this fine L. T. L.

I am a little girl eight years old. I belong to the L. T. L. I like your Cozy Corner very much, and I would like to come into it. I have never written to you before. I have quite a good many pets, two cats, a little dog, a hen. I call one of the horses mine, but papa always asks me who gave it to me. Your new niece,

MATTIE C. MOFFET.

What a happy girl with so many pets!

I am a prohibition girl. I am twelve years old. My grandma has taken THE UNION SIGNAL ever since it has been printed. Whenever I go to her house I try and see if I can get the puzzles. Sometimes I am successful, though I have only succeeded two times. I would like to become one of your nieces.

THE TWENTY-FIRST CONVENTION OF THE NATIONAL.

Cold and gray dawned the morning of November 16 in Cleveland; but leaden skies nor the damp, penetrating air of Lake Erie's turbulent waters could chill the enthusiasm of the white ribbon host which flocked to Music Hall. Was it not the "coming-of-age Convention" of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union? Had we not grown in twenty years from a little handful into a great host with our forces planted in every state and territory of the Union? Aye, more, had we not carried our white ribbon around the world, and is not the W. C. T. U. a household name in every land? Best of all, had not the Ohio Liquor Dealers' Association, recently convened in Cincinnati, declared, "We have but one enemy, and that is the Woman's Christian Temperance Union"? That declaration almost reconciled us to the enmity of some who should be our friends. What wonder that with all this to cheer them the women of the W. C. T. U. carried sunshine in their hearts and upon their faces in spite of gloomy wintry skies.

Twenty years since, in response to the call sent out from Chautauqua, the Crusade of the women of the land against the saloons crystallized into the organized protest of women against the legalized liquor traffic. Then sixteen states were represented and the committee on credentials reported one hundred and thirty-five names. In 1894, every state and territory is organized, and the committee on credentials reports four hundred and seven voting members. Of that original, historic one hundred and thirty-five, only six were among the delegates to the present Convention. But, though "God has buried the workers, the work still goes on."

The gavel rapped for order and every delegate remembered with a thrill of gratitude and joy that the hand which held it was the one which first took it up fourteen years ago; that "our best-beloved, our Frances Willard," restored in health, was again in her place at the head of our white ribbon host. On the next to the last day of the Convention Miss Willard assured the Convention that of all the twenty-one conventions, all of which but one she has attended, she had never felt so well, so "chipper," as at this one.

After the devotional exercises, Miss Willard spoke a few tender words concerning our beloved Mary A. Woodbridge, taken from us so suddenly, and brought forward her picture wreathed with ivy and myrtle from her own home, and planted by the hands now still in death. Miss Willard's voice trembled and broke as she spoke of this one whose unfailing good cheer always made lighter the burdens of her companions, but with the faith that looks beyond the skies, she rejoiced in the "great W. C. T. U. that has passed into the heavens."

The minutes of the several sessions of the executive committee were passed upon and then came one of the delightful episodes peculiar to women's conventions. Miss Willard asked for the singing of "There are Bands of Ribbon White Around the World," but instead, Mrs. Harris, the musical director, asked the Convention to join in singing the song which had just been distributed through the audience. It proved to be a beautiful new hymn entitled "Welcome, Chieftain, Welcome," written by Mrs. Katharine Lente Stevenson, at the request of Mrs. Woodbridge as a surprise for Miss Willard. At the close, Miss Willard said that so many kind things had been done for her that it was hard to surprise her, but she was surprised and very much touched. She then read selections from her annual address, which is one of the best of the many masterpieces she has given along this line.

We are entirely safe in saying that we can count on our fingers the number of associations which entering upon this past year in debt have, during this year of unparalleled business depression, not only paid off their debt, but have come out with a good surplus in the treasury. Yet this is precisely what this organization of women has done. And, women, be it ever remembered, are incapable of understanding or transacting business. At least they used to tell us so. One year ago the treasurer reported a deficit of $1,100, but outstanding bills, back salaries and unpaid appropriations swelled the amount to nearly $2,000. Such a debt in good times was bad enough, but in such a year as last, it was disheartening. You all know how the difficulty was met. Miss Willard wrote an autograph letter which was published in UNION SIGNAL asking for ten-cent contributions. "Dear hearts," she said to the Convention, "I only asked for $1,000 and you gave $3,000." So it happens that at the close of a year of financial ruin such as this country has never known before, the treasurer of the National W. C. T. U. reports the organization out of debt, and with a balance of $5,671.81 in the treasury.

The affiliated interests make almost as good a financial showing. The W. T. P. A. has a small deficit of $561, but when we remember the multitude of publishing and other business institutions that have gone down the past year, the W. T. P. A. is to be congratulated even more than in the years when it declared a dividend. Mrs. Grow announced that Miss Willard's appeal for new subscribers had resulted in the addition of 2,308 new names to the list, making the circulation 65,000. One lady suggested that the members of the Convention undertake to raise among themselves the deficit and pay it. Mrs. Grow replied, thanking the Convention for the thought, that this was a business house and could not accept charities, but that if they would raise the $500 and pay it into the treasury of the National with the stipulation that it be expended in buying literature for distribution, the Publishing Association would accept that.

The Temple has held its own and the Temperance Hospital has a surplus in the treasury.

Among the reasons for encouragement along other lines is the fact that in spite of the hard times nineteen states have increased their membership.

We sometimes wonder when our superintendents step forward and give their ten-minute reports, if white-ribboners fully appreciate the efficiency of our system. Consider these women, what they are to the W. C. T. U. and what the W. C. T. U. is to them. To the organization, they bring the fire of their zeal, inspire other women with their own enthusiasm, and draw into our ranks women interested in their several distinctive lines of work. On the other hand, but for the W. C. T. U. these superintendents would be single-handed workers, unknown beyond their own immediate neighborhood. As National superintendents of the W. C. T. U. each one becomes a general at the head of disciplined troops whose forces are planted in every state, territory, county, city, and many of the towns and villages of the nation. This is why Mary H. Hunt has been able to put scientific temperance instruction into all the schools of the nation with the exception of those in the five states of Indiana, Tennessee, Arkansas, Georgia and South Carolina, and why she will soon take the disgraceful black patch off from those states. This is why Lucia Kimball has given the temperance lesson a place in the International Series. This is why the age of consent has been raised in so many states and will continue to be raised until it disappears altogether. The reports of our superintendents are among the most important features of the Convention for they show what we have done during the year. Of the work among foreigners, one of the most interesting was that of Mrs. Grubb, who stands at the port of entry and meets the immigrants. Miss Anna Lindahl is the missionary who has been at Ellis Island and worked among these immigrants. Her work has received the highest praise from the government officials. Because of the hard times, she has for the past year had no stated source of salary and the work has been entirely on a faith basis, yet month after month the salary has come in. The Convention, after Mrs. Grubb's report, voted to take a collection for Miss Lindahl's salary. Thirty-one dollars were raised which was enough within four dollars to pay her November salary. Mrs. Grubb said she had not known whence it was to come.

Miss Greenwood's plea for the hour of prayer in the National Convention should not be unheeded. She reported that many of the state conventions had fallen into line, but the National, though year after year it had accepted her recommendation to observe the hour of prayer, had never acted upon it but once, and that was at Atlanta four years ago. We believe Miss Greenwood is right. Surely, sisters, we have time to pray. In our littleness, our shortsightedness, we overestimate our own importance in bringing in the kingdom of God. We fancy He cannot spare our services for one short hour, that His work will lag if we take time to pray. Most pitiful self-conceit! The greatest danger that threatens us as an organization is that we shall lose the old crusade spirit, and place our dependence more upon our organization than upon God.

Mrs. Lovell, of the department of mercy, began her report with the words, "Physician, heal thyself," and added, "It does not become any white-ribbon woman to wear aloft on her head the emblems of atrocious cruelty," and she was very sorry to say that she saw such symbols in the audience in the shape of aigret and ostrich plumes. It is but justice to our members to say that without doubt all of them sinned in ignorance, as the question was at once asked: "What is an aigret?" These subjects have so recently been made matters of investigation that very many women are entirely unconscious of the fact that such ornaments are obtained at the price of cruel suffering on the part of innocent creatures.

Mrs. Ingalls, of narcotics, reported that analysis of many headache medicines had shown that they contained opium, also that some chewing gum contains this poison. She reported that there was a crying need of education on the abuse of narcotics, that among our own sisterhood she found victims of anti-pyrine, cephalgine, bromide of potassa or some kindred medicine of whose real character these women were ignorant.

But time and space fail us to so much as name over the superintendents. If any white-ribboner wishes literature that will cause her to "thank God and take courage," if she wishes for inspiration and direction along any line of work, let her supply herself with the printed reports of the superintendents which may be obtained from Mrs. Katharine Lente Stevenson, the Temple, Chicago.

Many notables were presented from time to time and spoke kindly words of cheer. Friday evening, when the addresses of welcome were made and responded to, was, as always, an occasion of great interest. Mayor Blee gave the Convention a cordial welcome and expressed the hope the women might be so well treated that they would hold the Convention in Cleveland next year. He did not, however, express any views concerning our object. It is entirely safe to say that the saloon interests of the city did not take alarm from his speech of welcome. But, as Miss Willard says of the old political parties, he did "the best he could under the circumstances but his circumstances are very bad. We are trying to make them better."

Mrs. S. M. Perkins welcomed the Convention in behalf of the federated unions of Cleveland. Her speech was full of the hard sense and keen witticisms peculiar to her. Her sententious remark that "a male oligarchy is not a republic," is worthy to pass into the political literature of the nation along with the pithy sayings of Patrick Henry and other great leaders all down the line. Among the many admirable responses from which it is difficult to select, perhaps Mrs. Burt's is of special interest as coming from one of the six original one hundred and thirty-five. She closed a most vivid and beautiful picture of that first convention: "Again I see and hear one who through all these years has carried the white ribbon banner fearlessly and steadfastly forward—the one who saw farther into the future than any of us; the one who has beaten down more prejudice and opposition as regards the standing and position of women than any other woman in the country, one who has carried the white ribbon around the world, and we bring her back to you, our best beloved, Frances E. Willard."

Joseph Cook was introduced to the Convention and spoke ringing words of sympathy and cheer. He expressed his personal gratitude that "we now have restored to us on this side of the Atlantic the president of the most powerful, the most successful, the most useful organization ever formed by women in the whole tide of time." He congratulated the organization upon its growth and its achievements saying, "Nowhere on the globe can woman suffer and this society not know the facts; nowhere on the earth can a woman have just complaints to make and this society not be able to give them a voice that shall be heard at the ends of the world."

Several ministers of the city of various denominations dropped in and spoke kindly words of greeting, while on Sunday the pulpits of the city were filled by the women.

Sunday afternoon Dr. Bashford, president of Ohio Wesleyan University, one of the dauntless defenders of woman in General Conference, preached the annual sermon from the text, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." His subject was, "Problems of the Twentieth Century." In treating of the temperance problem he showed that all evils pass through three stages, general acceptance, opposition and finally, restrictive laws culminating in prohibition, and showed that the liquor evil is in the second stage.

On Tuesday occurred the election of officers. As in other organizations this is one of the most important and interesting events of the Convention, and we rejoice to say that it has never become, as in so many even religious organizations, an occasion for political trickery, for overreaching and hard feeling. The vote on the officers is in itself proof of this.

Just before the election, Miss Willard said she desired to make an explanation lest the Convention should think her more brazen than she really was! She said that it had always been the custom for the president when the time for election of officers came, to don her outer garments, go down the back stairs and remain away until after the election, but that Mrs. Benjamin, superintendent of parliamentary usages, said that people didn't do this any more and it looked as if she expected to be reëlected. She could see that the custom of secret ballot having been adopted in place of the custom of laudatory speeches in behalf of the candidate which had prevailed in the time of her predecessor made the circumstances entirely different, and it was not therefore necessary that she longer follow the example of her predecessor, and of course the W. C. T. U. wished above all things to be up with the times, so the president would remain hereafter. Miss Shaw said that at the suffrage association she had always insisted that their president, Miss Anthony, retire while they reëlected her because Miss Willard did, and that Miss Anthony had always rebelled; she was glad that Miss Anthony would not have to withdraw any more. The Ohio president claimed that Ohio was to the front as usual because at the two last state conventions the president had not withdrawn. The Massachusetts delegation said Ohio was not ahead of Massachusetts, but an Ohio delegate replied that was only because the president of Massachusetts was an Ohio woman. Several states having testified that their own custom had been the one about to be adopted by the National, Miss Willard remarked, "It's always the way, the daughters are smarter than the mother."

The first informal ballot for president resulted in 394 votes cast, of which 390 were for Miss Willard. The Convention at once arose and gave her the Chautauqua salute while Mrs. Harris led in singing once more, "Welcome, Chieftain, Welcome." The ballot was declared formal and the secretary instructed to cast a ballot for Miss Willard, after which Mrs. Fessenden declared Frances E. Willard President of the National W. C. T. U. At this point Miss Willard was presented with two gavels, one for herself and one for Lady Henry Somerset, made from wood taken from the house in which Miss Willard was born at Churchville, N. Y. Mrs. Lucy Thurman, in behalf of the colored women of Cleveland, presented the newly elected president with a beautiful bouquet of yellow and white chrysanthemums tied with yellow and white ribbon. She said the yellow ribbon indicated that when the ballot came to women, as come it would, the colored women also would cast the ballot for the home.

At this point Miss Willard named the vice-president-at-large, who should take the president's place at any time when it was necessary. This was done in accordance with a by-law passed the day before. Miss Willard nominated Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, president of Maine. The nomination was received with enthusiasm, and unanimously ratified by the Convention.

The first informal ballot for corresponding secretary was taken, resulting in 390 votes cast, of which 286 were for Mrs. Katharine Lente Stevenson. The vote was made formal, and the secretary instructed to cast the ballot of the Convention for Mrs. Stevenson.

Informal ballot for recording secretary gave Mrs. Clara C. Hoffman 230 out of 389 votes. The ballot was declared formal. Mrs. Hoffman arose and thanked the Convention, but said she had been assisting the recording secretary during the Convention, and had neither slept, eaten nor washed her hands since she commenced, for she hadn't had time. "Now, dear sisters," she said, "I have not accepted this office yet, and I would not accept it for ten thousand dollars unless you will have a stenographer on this platform that shall take every word that is given and then shall typewrite it out and let me pick out what is necessary." The Convention voted that Mrs. Hoffman should have the stenographer. Mrs. Hoffman named as her assistant Mrs. Frances E. Beauchamp, of Kentucky. The nomination was unanimously ratified.

The informal ballot for treasurer was then taken. Mrs. Helen M. Barker received 363 out of 382 votes, and the ballot was made formal.

Thus all the general officers of the National were elected by the informal ballot. If this is not evidence of harmony within our ranks and a blessed absence of wire-pulling politics, we do not know how these desirable features could be shown.

In the matter of finances and in the election of its officers, the National W. C. T. U. challenges comparison with any philanthropic society in the world.

Wednesday was devoted largely to the consideration of the report of the resolutions committee. After five days of hard work the delegates, weary but light-hearted and hopeful, bade good-by to Cleveland with its hospitable homes and went their several ways to carry on the work each in her own place. From its twenty-first convention the National W. C. T. U starts out from Cleveland as it started twenty years ago with its purpose unchanged—the total annihilation of the liquor traffic.

GREED OF THE RUM POWER.

In the general hopefulness which characterizes the business outlook at the present time liquor men are not slow to express their satisfaction and to rejoice that in the strengthening of commercial interests throughout the country better times are promised for the whisky trade.

Those watch towers of the rum forces, the liquor journals, note with fiendish glee the indications of "increased earnings of labor," and the consequent "substantial improvement" of the liquor business. One of them, giving editorial encouragement to "the trade," and cautioning merchants not to "fritter away" unbonded ninety cent stocks "as though they could replace them at the same rate of taxation," commends patience as the "cardinal virtue of the hour." "Business in every line is steadily gaining," it says, "factories are resuming operations, and with increased earnings of labor, consumption, the basis of demand, as a matter of course, is bound proportionately to increase."

How forcibly does this emphasize the hawk-like character of the rum power! How like a monster bird of prey watching its opportunity to pounce upon its victim! The liquor fraternity deplores the existence of a great army of unemployed, and rejoices at the approach of better times for the wage-earner. Why? Because it is inclined to humanitarianism and brotherly love? Nay verily, but because its own life depends upon the earnings of the laboring man; because, vampire-like, it fattens upon the blood of those, who, as General Booth declares, are "the glory of any country—its honest, hard-working peasantry."

For the falling off in sales complained of by the liquor dealers demonstrates that this business flourishes by the patronage of that class which is popularly termed the "labor" class. It is the wage-earner who has suffered most from the commercial depression of the past two years. The stagnant condition, while affecting in more or less degree the capitalist and the employer, has not deprived him of the comforts and necessaries of life as it has his humbler brother. The cases are rare where the "hard times" have deprived the rich man of a single luxury; it certainly has not in any case deprived him of his grog.

The liquor seller knows full well that were it not for the nickels and dimes of the "sons of toil"—which aggregate in a year many more dollars than the spenders are apt to think—many a saloon-keeper might shut up shop, many a groggery be turned into a grocery. It is the hard-earned money of the day laborer, the mechanic and the clerk which, pouring steadily into the till of the liquor seller, makes whisky trusts and beer syndicates possible.

And what does the liquor dealer give in exchange for the workingman's earnings of which with other merchants he greedily claims a share? Food, clothing, shelter? Happiness? Improvement? No. He gives instead that which robs him of all these. He gives him that which makes him poor indeed, in that it reduces the capacity of hand and brain (as employers are finding out to their cost) and produces a mental and moral degeneracy which renders "labor" less competent to protect itself against the autocracy of "capital."

We claim that no industry has a right to exist which does not contribute in some measure to the general welfare and prosperity of the nation at large. As in a perfect physical organism every organ and every atom contribute to the health and happiness of the body as a whole, so true economic science would declare that every human being should be not only a consumer, but in some degree, at least, a producer of wealth, material or moral—a contributor to the well being of society as a whole.

Now the liquor "industry" is not only non-productive of good, but it is an actual and an active producer of an enormous and dangerous class of non-producers. The saloon, the gambling den, the brothel, the jail, the poorhouse, the insane asylum all furnish their quota to the social discord, all add to the sum of human misery, and all are to more or less extent the products of the liquor traffic. And still "the trade" bids unblushingly for its share of the earnings of labor!

The hard times have doubtless taught the wage-worker many a salutary lesson. If among other things he has learned that one fruitful cause of the impoverished condition of the masses is the unfairness of the labor and drink exchange (of which money is the medium); if he has awakened to the fact that his earnings are worse than wasted when they are transferred to the pockets of the drink-seller, and that if he can do without his glass of whisky or beer when he has not the wherewith to buy it, he can do without it always, then the hard times will not have come upon this land in vain.

ACTION OF ILLINOIS SYNOD.

In October, the Synod of the Presbyterian Church of Illinois received from its Standing Committee on Temperance, a report with resolutions, which shows plainly that while staunch Presbyterianism may move slowly, it yet moves. The report submits among others the following unmistakable utterances:

There never was a time in the history of the movement more auspicious and promising of rich results than now. It is a time of general arousement and enthusiasm among all classes of workers, and when the whole army becomes aroused for battle, defeat is impossible. None must be disloyal, none must be idle, all must be united to accomplish the overthrow of the saloon.

If these utterances of the august body are crystallized by the action of the membership of the church at the ballot boxes of the land, then, and then alone, will the friends of disloyalty and idleness be overthrown. The report continues:

In proof of the attitude of the great Presbyterian Church towards this gigantic evil, we need but refer to the resolutions and deliverances of her legislative courts. . . . The Presbyterian Church of the United States of America is thoroughly and uncompromisingly committed to the warfare against all forms of traffic in intoxicating liquors.

But the Synod went still further. Upon recommendation of the committee it not only heartily indorsed the Christian Temperance Alliance of Illinois, but commended this organization "to the attention of ministers and sessions throughout the bounds of the Synod."

A word as to the origin and purpose of the Alliance will emphasize the significance of this synodical action. The Central Illinois Conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, realizing that "earnest utterances" and "emphatic language" against the liquor traffic are trifles light as air when not clinched by effective action, called a meeting of the several denominations and a convention was held in Peoria a year ago, to devise measures for united action. As a result the Christian Temperance Alliance of Illinois was formed. This body states as its object, pure and simple, "The Extirpation of the Liquor Traffic," to be accomplished by—1. Education along the lines of total abstinence and prohibition. 2. Strict enforcement of the prohibitory measures of existing laws. 3. Early enactment of more stringent laws for the suppression of the traffic. 4. Ultimate suppression of the liquor traffic in every state.

The third and fourth resolutions submitted to the synod by its temperance committee are emphatic:

3. That while we would not recommend the church of Jesus Christ to enter the political arena in any partisan spirit, even to accomplish a needed reform, yet on this most important of all reform questions now in politics, before the American people, we recommend that all our ministers and lawyers pronounce most emphatically against any party that does not promise definite legislation looking to the extirpation of the accursed traffic.

4. That we as a synod pledge ourselves to the righteous principle of statutory Prohibition.

The adoption by this representative body of these radical resolutions is additional evidence of the "rich results" of temperance agitation and one of the many encouraging omens of still richer results in the near future.

MISSOURI.

A FINE CONVENTION IN BROOKFIELD.

We have just closed one of the largest, and what is generally considered the best state convention in our history. The decorating committee had made Green's Opera House attractive with potted plants, bunting and banners. Pictures of Miss Willard and the Temple were placed on easels, and appropriate mottoes adorned the walls. The session opened Wednesday morning, October 24, with our president, Mrs. Clara Hoffman, in the chair. Our excellent corresponding secretary gave her annual report, showing that we had no reason for discouragement over the work of the year. Many new members had been reported, but only those who had paid for the year closing could be counted. The treasurer, Mrs. Julia A. Glazier, surprised us by announcing in her report that we had not only met all obligations this year, but had a balance of $477 in the treasury.

Mrs. Rebecca Hall, our state evangelist, conducted each morning a most helpful devotional service, to which we attribute much of the uplift and blessing of the convention. An impressive memorial service for promoted comrades was held by Mrs. Ira Lewis, of Kansas City. Twenty-three active and five honorary members have passed into the presence of the King this year.

In the afternoon Mrs. Julia B. Eversole spoke on railroad work, showing the wonderful work accomplished by the Railroad Temperance Association, of which one-fifth of the members enrolled in the United States belong to Missouri.

Mrs. Lucy Wisker, of Sedalia, spoke of the state paper. It was decided to discontinue the paper and adopt the Missouri Voice, of St. Louis, as the official organ of the state, Mrs. Wisker to be editor of the W. C. T. U. department. Mrs. C. E. Howe, of St. Joseph, Miss Lillian Wood, of Maryville, and Miss Carrie Lee Carter, of Dexter, state organizers, gave brief and interesting talks on their work.

Mrs. Belle Kimball, of Kirkwood, spoke of the success of parlor meetings as a means of securing new members, and stated that a large number of members had been gained this year. Mrs. Kate Newton spoke on the use of unfermented wine for the communion, and stated that it was generally used in the smaller towns, but there was need of work in some country districts and in cities.

The state president's annual address was very fine; in terse and strong Saxon she reviewed the questions that most vitally affect the nation's life, yet through all breathed the spirit of Christ. Her tender words of appreciation for the faithful workers touched all hearts, and at the close Mother Hall voiced our thanksgiving and prayer for such a leader.

Wednesday evening was welcome night. First his honor, the mayor, welcomed the delegates to the city, then Rev. F. M. Green brought greetings from the churches. Mr. Wm. Wells, from the Y. P. S. C. E., Mr. C. W. Green, of the Brookfield Argus, on behalf of the press, and lastly, the sisterly greeting from the local union by Mrs. E. A. P. Hayes. The response was delivered by the vice-president, Miss Lillian Wood, of Maryville.

The Y's took charge of the remainder of the evening, under the leadership of Miss Carrie Lee Carter, secretary of the Y Branch. The exercises consisted of recitations, papers and addresses, with excellent music by the Brookfield young ladies' quartette, Misses Warren, Simpson, Leaphart and Daggett. The interesting program was closed with the presentation of a wreath of flowers to Mrs. Hoffman, who declared her heart was as young as ever.

Thursday morning suggestions from superintendents of the various departments were given. Sister Estelle, of Hephzibah Home, St. Louis, spoke on the great work to be done in the purity department. Miss Emma Robinson, of Kansas City, read a beautiful paper on the "Development of Women Through the W. C. T. U." "Members; To Get Them and Keep Them," was the topic of the discussion opened by Mrs. Millie Lewis, of Winfield, and various methods were recommended.

Mrs. Patti Moore, of Kansas City, was introduced, and urged that our society endeavor to secure the appointment of a matron for every jail, and also work for the appointment of a state board of charities. "How to Reach Unorganized Districts" was practically explained by Mrs. Howe, of St. Joseph. Miss Ellen Morris announced that one million pages of literature had been distributed in the state this past year, and advised the women to push the medal contest work.

Mrs. Golladay, of Holden, told of the advantages of public meetings, and the beneficial results accruing therefrom. A suffrage catechism, prepared by Mrs. Hedges, of Warrensburg, proved both entertaining and instructive.

"Hindrances in Local Work" in city and country, was treated most helpfully by Mrs. E. B. Ingalls, of St. Louis, and Mrs. May Woods of Mt. Vernon.

"Why does the Y vanish?" was the question propounded Miss Carter, who stated that the principal reasons were lack of consecrated leaders, lack of care on the part of mother unions, constant change of membership, and failure to use their own literature.

Because of the death of Mrs. Mary Woodbridge, Mrs. Barker, our speaker for Thursday evening, was unable to be with us, but Mrs. Sophie Grubb, of Kirkwood, National superintendent of work among foreigners, delivered a most interesting lecture on "The Gate-Keepers of the Nation."

The old board of officers was elected: President, Mrs. Clara C. Hoffman; vice-president, Miss Lillian Wood; corresponding secretary, Miss Ellen D. Morris; recording secretary, Mrs. Kate Newton; treasurer, Mrs. Julia Glazier.

Friday afternoon a pleasant surprise was given Mrs. Hoffman. A dainty flower-trimmed basket, containing a "rest fund" of $200 in silver, was presented to her by Mrs. May Woods on behalf of the W. C. T. U., of Missouri. In tender, loving words our president expressed her appreciation of the gift.

Friday evening an enjoyable entertainment, entitled "An Adjourned Session of the Missouri Legislature" was given under the management of Mrs. E. B. Ingalls.

NOTES.

All sessions of the convention were largely attended, and in the evenings the hall was crowded to overflowing.

The ladies of the various churches served bountiful lunches each day for the delegates.

The music of the convention, under the leadership of Miss Warren, one of Brookfield's sweet singers, with Miss Green as accompanist on the piano, was greatly enjoyed.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

YEARLY INGATHERING.

The sixth annual convention of South Dakota W. C. T. U. was called to order at Aberdeen on the morning of September 6 by Mrs. Emma Cranmer, state president. The large number of delegates present at the opening session showed that in spite of hard times the women of our state are aroused to the importance of this work.

Mrs. Eugene Steere conducted devotional exercises, after which Mrs. L. V. Crow, local president, most pleasantly welcomed the visitors. Mayor Jumper was introduced and welcomed the convention in behalf of the city. Following the mayor, addresses in behalf of the churches were made by Revs. Hager and Mallory. In response to these, Mrs. Alice M. Pickler spoke most pleasantly and earnestly.

Friday morning convention was called to order by the president, and after the devotional exercises the corresponding secretary called the roll, to which every officer and every district president but one, responded. After the appointing of committees some time was taken by district presidents reporting their work. These reports were of intense interest and showed marked progress.

One hundred and twenty-two delegates were present, the largest convention ever held in the state. Noontide prayer was conducted by Emma L. Swartz, and was indeed a spiritual uplifting. In the afternoon came reports of president, corresponding secretary and treasurer.

A summary of president's report: The number of lectures and talks given, 160; unions organized and reorganized, 12; conventions attended, 8; Chautauquas addressed, 3; counties visited, 30; districts visited, 5; states visited, 5; towns and school-houses visited, 98; parliamentary drills held, 17; money subscribed at meetings through mite-box plan for state, district, county and local work, $800.

Her work cannot be estimated. She is in the field most of the time, and when at home does not throw off the care, for her mind and pen are kept busy. This year additional work has been given her.

The question of resubmitting our prohibitory law will come before the state legislature this winter. It is most important that we have some one on the ground to fight for our prohibitory law. Two years ago Mrs. Cranmer and our vice-president, Anna R. Simmons, fought the battle so bravely and came off victorious. We felt the work could not be placed in better hands, so these brave women are to go again to the field of battle. May the Lord give them strength and courage.

The corresponding secretary's report showed a number of new unions and several old ones revived. The sixth district has the largest membership, also the greatest number of unions, but the per cent of gain has been greatest in the fifth district, and the banner was presented to it to be kept for at least one year.

The treasurer's report was received with great interest. At the close of last year we found ourselves in debt and have been working all the year to throw it off. The mite-box plan was adopted and has proven of great help, over two hundred dollars having been collected through this means. There are very few people but can afford to give one and one-fourth cents a week to this grand cause, and what a help all these littles are to the state treasury. These reports were received with great enthusiasm and a rising vote of thanks given for each one.

An interesting feature of the program was a mothers' meeting, conducted by Mrs. Jessie Wilson, of Andover. The time was limited but much was presented that was most beneficial. The papers are to be printed in the White Ribbon Journal.

Mrs. Anna Simmons presided Friday evening. A solo by Mrs. Morrison, of Webster, and a recitation by Mrs. Wilson, of Salem, were most pleasing. The president was then introduced and gave her annual address. This was received with great enthusiasm. Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge, since passed away, was now introduced to the audience. This was acknowledged by all rising and giving her the Chautauqua salute. She spoke briefly, but we felt that we had with us a friend and helper. This was indeed proven as time went on, for she was almost constantly in the sessions of the convention and ever ready to give us words of counsel.

Saturday morning was given up to reports of superintendents and introduction of visitors until time for noontide hour of prayer. How important it is that at least one hour after a morning of hard work be given to communing with our Father.

Saturday afternoon the convention resolved itself into an equal suffrage convention, and was called to order by the president, Mrs. Mary Groesbeck, of Watertown. Mrs. Groesbeck's address showed much work done under very trying circumstances. She deeply regretted her inability to more thoroughly arouse the women to action. She said, "we should concentrate our efforts for franchise this coming year if we would reach the goal we are seeking."

The question of granting full school suffrage to woman is to be voted on at the coming election. It is hoped that the "men people" will feel that we have rights as well as they and cast their votes accordingly.

The convention voted to adopt the National constitution and by-laws and become a permanent organization. Mrs. Simmons spoke on legislation, and gave her experience in the political conventions the past summer. Considerable time was taken in discussing them.

Mrs. Woodbridge then gave twenty minutes to the question box.

Mrs. Pickler spoke in behalf of Kansas and a pledge of one hundred dollars was made and a good share of it collected immediately.

The plan of work committee advocated suffrage contests and distributing literature.

At this point an opportunity was given to join the state association. Thirty-nine names were secured at once. The convention closed with a parliamentary drill by Mrs. Cranmer.

On Saturday evening a grand gold Demorest medal contest was held. The medal was won by Miss Hannah McDonald, of Highmore. The other contestants each received a volume of beautifully bound poems. The presentation was made by Mrs. Woodbridge. Mrs. Edwards, of Aberdeen, an old lady of eighty years, gave a most pleasing recitation and responded to an encore.

Sunday morning Mrs. Woodbridge preached the annual sermon in the M. E. Church. It was a fine evangelistic sermon and one that appealed to the hearts of the hearers.

In the afternoon a Y meeting was held in the same church, presided over by Mrs. Lulu Ramsey, state superintendent of Y work.

An L. T. L. service was held at the same hour in the Christian church, conducted by Mrs. J. H. Best.

In the evening the opera house was packed with an audience eager to listen to Mrs. Woodbridge. She held them to the end with words of wisdom. Is it any wonder we all learned to love her in the few days she was with us? It is hard to realize that she who has been so useful here has been taken from us never to return. Little did we think that within a month the eloquent tongue, the active brain, the kind heart would be stilled in death's eternal sleep. We all find satisfaction in knowing that the brave and consecrated soul has entered upon a new and better life, where there will be no sin with which to contend, and her good works will live after her to bless the "millions yet to be." Monday morning Mrs. Woodbridge took the chair and a short consecration service was held, after which the election took place and resulted in the almost unanimous vote for the old officers. The afternoon was given up to reports of superintendents, committees, passing resolutions and other matters of business. Mrs. Flora M. Swift, editor of White Ribbon Journal, was unable to be present, and her report was read by the corresponding secretary. At the close her resignation was also read. This was heard with deep regret. Mrs. Swift had endeared herself to the women all over the state during the past year. The report and resignation were accepted, and Floy L. Cochrane, of Brookings, elected to fill the vacancy.

The following ladies were elected as delegates to the National Convention at Cleveland: Mrs. J. H. Best, of Artesian; Mrs. E. V. Milliken, Alpena; and Mrs. Louise P. Crow, Aberdeen.

Mrs. Woodbridge gave a lecture on equal suffrage in the evening. The closest attention was given the speaker, and all regretted that she would not speak to us again. After the address a few items of business came before the women, and then "We'll Never say Good-bye" was sung, and with hearty handshaking and best wishes the delegates separated to meet in Pierre next year.

Since convention several unions have been organized and others re-organized, and our president writes me that we are entitled to another delegate. We now have over fifteen hundred members.

GLEANINGS.

The secretaries of the districts and county presidents all seem to be busy about their work of organizing and reviving unions and L. T. L's, holding medal contests, arranging for lectures, and planning a regular winter campaign.

As usual our president is "on the go." She found the Lawrence people wide awake and full of the importance of our work. A tent meeting was being conducted by Mr. Johnson, who gave the temperance women the right of way. Big crowds and a blessing were the results.

A small union was organized at Terrell, with Mrs. McShaw as leader. At Farney three times as many honoraries joined the union as women. A member of the school board is superintendent of scientific temperance instruction.

At Lone Elm Mrs. Stoddard spoke to a nice audience. At Longview the results were most gratifying. The ministers are in perfect sympathy and the two score of women will do "valiantly in the Lord."

On woman's day at the Farmers' State Alliance, at Grand View, Mrs. Stoddard represented the W. C. T. U. The reception given our sacred principles was hearty showing how dear prohibition is to the hearts of our moral farmer class. There were ten thousand people present on woman's day, one-third more than on any other day. Mrs. Jack spoke for suffrage, Mrs. Diggs, of Kansas, for populism.

A delightful parlor meeting given to the state president in the home of Rev. Homer Wilson, of Fort Worth, resulted in the formation of a Y, with Miss Wilson as president and Miss Jarvis as vice-president.

Dallas W. C. T. U. is to have a Rest Cottage at the state fair, where tired mothers can rest, and a nursery, where, for a small sum, children can be cared for by loving W. C. T. U. mothers.

Ennis union boasts that it is "very awake." Self-Denial week the sisters all agreed to earn a dollar. One knit a chair cushion and mitts; others did their own washing and ironing; one made children's dresses, and so on until they had eight dollars, and others will pay later.

Corpus Christie W. C. T. U. is also "on the move." An interesting gospel temperance meeting was held on Miss Willard's birthday, participated in by the ministers of the city and the Epworth League. There were two services, at four and eight P. M.

The Violet Y's of Waco have kept up the flower mission work all summer, sending small, harmoniously arranged and fragrant bouquets to the sick or otherwise unfortunate. Frequently the bouquets are accompanied by a little gift, a delicacy for the sick, quilt pieces, a loaf of bread, a potted plant. What lovelier work could there be for young girls! This Y does not confine itself to the æsthetic part of the work, but looks well to the finances. Each member invests money and trades for her society. They have recently paid three dollars on the publishing fund for the Texas White Ribbon.

Corsicana, Austin and Whitt have all responded to the appeal to raise a publishing fund. At Whitt they had an old ladies' contest. There were five contestants, the prize, "A Great Mother," was awarded to Mrs. Mary Doss. The contest was greatly enjoyed and appreciated. One of the contestants writes: "It was amusing to see how we old gray heads attempted to 'elocute.'"

MEDAL CONTESTS.

Round Rock has held "one of the best ever held," so Miss Angus says. Six young men were the contestants. They were all employed, but found time to prepare the recitations and get advertisements to pay for the printing of bills and programs. The house was beautifully decorated, and filled with an appreciative audience. The medal was awarded to Mr. Jeff Stephens in an appropriate speech by Professor Hale, superintendent of the schools.

Ennis had a class of ten, four boys and six girls, who gave evidence of the skillful training they had received. The medal was awarded to Miss Daisy King. Afterward the class was taken into the country about five miles, where the declamations were repeated to an appreciative audience in Oak Grove church.

San Antonio, West End L. T. L., held its fifth medal contest, with the usual interest. There were four girls and two boys. The medal was awarded to Miss Matilda Nichols in a witty speech by Rev. J. E. Harrison.

Our superintendent of medal contests, Miss Fanny Chambers, has spent her vacation speaking in the eighth district, and those who have heard our talented superintendent know what a treat she gave her audiences.

Again I am called to chronicle the promotion of one of our most faithful comrades. Mrs. Lizzie D. Johnson, of Paris, superintendent of prison work, has gone to her reward. She was just in the prime of life and so devoted to her work. For years she has conducted a Sunday-school every Sunday morning in the large jail in Paris, where not only county and city prisoners are incarcerated, but Federal prisoners from the Indian Territory. We wonder who can take her place, but remember "God buries His workmen but carries on His work."

WEST VIRGINIA BREVITIES.

No items from here appearing in THE UNION SIGNAL recently, one might suppose we had been swamped under the ponderous consideration of tariff reform.

On the contrary, we are still sticking our heads up whenever an opportunity affords, and urging a re-form that shall include men as well as measures.

Our new president, Mrs. N. C. Morrow, is untiring in her zeal, and is doing much work, much worry and much traveling. Wherever she goes she reports large meetings, attentive listeners, and unions, if not large in numbers, filled with determination to stick to the fight or die with the harness on.

District conventions are being held with varying success; some are well attended and enthusiastic; some poorly attended; all do good.

Demorest medal contests are becoming quite frequent, and gain in popularity. Each union is being urged to hold public meetings, and so far as we are able to learn this is being done.

Our cry this year is organization, better and more of it. To this end Miss C. S. Burnett, of Ohio, is employed by the state as an organizer, and if her letters are to be trusted, and we think they are, West Virginia sentiment on the temperance question is crystallizing into something that by and by and very soon shall have force and weight. Miss Burnett is going into the home, into the school, into the church; if there is any lurking sentiment of prohibition she kindles it into a flame; if there is none whatever, she invariably succeeds in manufacturing some. She is excellent also on the resurrection of the dead union. If we had the money and three more Miss Burnetts this would be the best state in the Union.

Many places will take John G. Woolley in his June week in this state.

When we get used to reporting items, and teach our local unions to send the news to us, we hope to give news in fewer words and more of it. M. KATE EBERT, Corresponding Secretary, Fairmont.

MINNESOTA.

The last number of the Minnesota White Ribboner lies before me, looking a little strange yet in its new dress, though this is the third or fourth time it has been worn. But the contents have the familiar names, some new ones added, and the paper is replete with the spirit of work. An editorial from the Oregon White Ribbon is copied, congratulating the Minnesota W. C. T. U. in having been fortunate enough to secure Mrs. S. M. D. Fry for our new state president.

Our new corresponding secretary informs us that the state minutes are ready. Send ten cents for a copy to Mrs. A. C. McCurdy, 210 E. Grant street, Minneapolis. The more copies there are ordered the better Mrs. McCurdy will be pleased; and the more the minutes are read, yes, studied, the more intelligent workers will we have.

Not many unions have sent in reports of anything done since the state convention. Please don't forget your UNION SIGNAL reporter.

The tenth district held its annual convention some time ago, and a royal good time they had, the result of no little planning and work, as even the program showed before the convention opened. And somehow or other they found their way into the papers, too, several columns, in the aggregate, being given to reports in the city papers, so that many who did not attend the sessions, no doubt learned something of what our women are doing. Mrs. Hobart was present, and lent a hand at several points, besides giving an address on one evening of the convention. A unique feature was an evening reception to the state officers.

Hennepin county held a semi-annual meeting in October, the result of a resolution to that effect at the annual meeting last May. Mrs. Neal, our well beloved president, opened a discussion on parlor meetings, believing that to be the best method for securing new members. Mrs. J. W. Wells also spoke in favor of them, and thought they would be a great help in Sunday-school work, suffrage and other departments. The literature department was discussed and suggestions made, among them one to the effect that unions make scrap-books to send to the jail for the prisoners to read. The evening session was largely occupied by an address by Rev. M. E. Alley.

Redwood Falls union reports that "more than ever before in the history of our local organization our members are wide awake and active." After a long illness the president is restored to the work. Honorary members are showing a willingness to work, and the young people's different societies are uniting their forces with the union, and altogether have declared war upon the saloon. A parlor meeting was held not long after the state convention at which the returned delegates gave an enthusiastic report. Many besides the members of the union were present, including the clergy of the town, the mayor and others who joined in talking over and formulating plans against the saloon and other evil places of the town. The burden of the conference was, "We must do something to save our boys."

The union has taken up twelve different departments of work. Scientific temperance instruction in the local schools is being vigorously agitated, and while some opposition is met the law will be carried out. Demorest medal contests are being made a specialty of the year's campaign, and are quite popular. A crowded house greeted the eight girls (Query.—Why is it nearly always girls?) who spoke at the opera house recently. Miss Nellie Gibson won the silver medal, and a year's subscription to our Young Women was presented as second and third prizes by some prohibition friends. Press work is being carried on regularly and actively. All other departments are "moving right along." Thirty fresh air children were entertained in the summer, and two have found homes for the winter.

At the dedication of the new high school building in Pipestone last month a portrait of Miss Willard, framed in a handsome oak frame, was presented the school by Mrs. Elizabeth C. Frisbee and Mrs. Mattie Bull, in behalf of the local W. C. T. U.

WORK IN THE FIELD.

On her way to the National Convention, Mrs. Lucia H. Additon, of Portland, Oregon, lectured through Wyoming by request of our state officers. She found things much different in our state than in any other she ever lectured in, and I fear we did not make as good an impression upon her as she did upon us.

She spoke at Evanston, Rock Springs, Green River, Laramie and Cheyenne, and as the reports are much alike I copy an extract from the letter of Mrs. S. A. Bristol, the local president at Cheyenne:

"Not being able to obtain a suitable place for Mrs. Additon's lecture the night of her arrival, we had an informal reception for her at Mrs. Maynard's. There was a good attendance of members and friends and we had a delightful evening. Dainty refreshments were served, and the evening was spent in conversation relative to our work, we asking questions and Mrs. Additon answering them in a most encouraging and helpful way.

"On Sunday evening she occupied the Methodist pulpit, the Presbyterian church united in listening to the eloquent appeal to Christians to come up to the full measure of their duty and privilege in helping to drive the liquor traffic from our land."

The state, just now, is very much exercised over politics, being on the eve of an election, and many of the men and some of the women were afraid Mrs. Additon would spoil some of their good Republican or Democratic doctrines, and she did, and might have spoiled some votes had we had a Prohibition ticket in the field. She lectured seven times, addressed one Sunday-school and gave several afternoon talks. We hope to have her stop on her way home from the National. F. A. JONES,

NOTES.

About the first of October a temperance camp meeting was held at Southern Park, near Louisville. Lou Beauchamp and Sam Jones were both present and took part in the exercises. Mrs. Frances E. Beauchamp, of Lexington, state organizer, who was returning from the state convention, gave an address on W. C. T. U. day. The East End W. C. T. U. of Louisville had charge on that day.

The Lexington W. C. T. U. organized an L. T. L. on Miss Willard's birthday, and the names of one hundred and thirteen children were enrolled. At the last meeting of the Lexington W. C. T. U. sixty-five dollars was reported as collected for the winter's work.

At a recent meeting of the Central W. C. T. U., of Louisville, Mrs. Lehman, of New Albany, gave an address on social purity, which was pronounced one of the strongest and most instructive lectures the union has had. Col. George W. Bain will speak for them some time in January. A donation of fifty dollars from a friend was reported and very gratefully received.

Miss Clara Parrish organized a Y at Covington, recently.

MICHIGAN ETCHINGS.

The golden-rod, which by the popular vote was made the National flower, nods at you from every hillside, plain and valley, clear into November, and says in flower language as we of the W. C. T. U. say in our native tongue, "You'll see we shall win." I thought of this one day this summer, when it was ninety in the shade, and some of the faithful women of the North Side union of Flint walked an even mile to attend a mothers' meeting. The lovely home of an outsider had been thrown open to us; the subject was "dress"; the program well filled and carried out, and as the many strangers to our work said, "We have enjoyed it so much," we nodded our heads and felt repaid. This union has what the Salvation Army is always talking about, stick-to-ativeness.

First district had a successful convention at Detroit, with change of president, as their former one had been elected state treasurer. The Wyandotte union gave an entertainment for the benefit of the lumberman's fund and made nine dollars.

Second district.—Dundee has been honored through its president, Mrs. Gainsby, who was recently elected member of the school board. Ann Arbor union worked at the polls and helped elect a woman on their school board. Lambertville union gave a fruit supper, giving the proceeds which amounted to sixteen dollars to an aged couple who had lost their all by fire. Erie held a most interesting parlor meeting, at which there were readings from THE UNION SIGNAL and the leaflet, "Busy Women and the W. C. T. U." Little Lake union held a gospel temperance meeting the Friday evening before election.

Third district.—Branch county convention was held at Girard. An interesting feature was the conference of local presidents, under the head of "What Interests Your Union Most? Why?" Mrs. A. S. Benjamin gave the evening address and also conducted a school of methods. The last evening was devoted to a grand gold medal contest, Miss Jessie McNaughton, of California, receiving the medal. Coats Grove reports a silver medal contest in the interest of woman suffrage. The participants were five ladies and one gentleman, all over thirty-five, and one lady nearly sixty. All did well. Mrs. Kate Joslyn secured the medal. A new union at Kinderhook. Clarendon opened an Epworth League convention with their fourth Demorest contest. Their annual meeting of this district was held at Eaton Rapids. The speaker of the evening was Mrs. Rounds.

Fourth district held annual meeting at Vicksburg. Julia R. Parish, state corresponding secretary, was present and most helpful at every session. In her evening address she emphasized the well doing of common things, "all the powers of this world and of sin cannot crush out the good that the W. C. T. U. has accomplished in the last twenty-one years, and it has all been done by doing common things."

Fifth district.—This is Mrs. Benjamin's special field, but she is an "all over." Kent county held convention at Rockford, enrolling forty-two delegates. The state Y banner is held by this district this year. Miss Clara Wheeler reported that the Sparta union has maintained a free kindergarten for the last two months. This union is worthy of its name. Papers of special interest were read by Mrs. Boise and others. A Demorest gold medal contest one evening, Mrs. Bailey was the speaker the other.

At Allegan county convention a paper was read by Mrs. Burton upon "The Present Outlook," a logical, spicy and sarcastic presentation. I quote a paragraph only: "Miss Woman's Christian Temperance Union will, on December 23, 1894, reach her majority. She will be twenty-one years old and should then be called Madam W. C. T. U. She has been to school and learned her lessons. She has been whipped with the look of scorn and ordered to stand in the corner in disgrace because she could be neither coaxed nor driven to spell truth l-i-e and lie t-r-u-t-h and define 'righteousness' to mean 'popularity.' The walls behind her corner crumbled away and the obstacles before her turned to heaps of rubbish and were blown away by the breath of truth and left her standing upon the high, broad and rock-bedded platform 'For God and Home and Human Good.' "

Sixth district, Genesee county convention was held at Fenton, having a good attendance. The program was full of reports and our district president gave us several talks and a Bible reading. A paper entitled "Connectional Organization" was read by Mrs. C. H. Johnson. The evening was well filled by Mrs. A. S. Benjamin, and the rendering of Mrs. Lathrap's "Shadow on the Hearth" by a group of well-trained young girls. Miss Jennings who had this in charge, is a musician of a high order, so that the renderings were perfect.

Mrs. Aldrich, our valuable county president, declining to serve longer, Mrs. Bailey of Brent Creek, was elected.

Clio is valiant in work. Two suits have been conducted in which the saloonists paid fifty dollars fines; and another suit is pending. This union has lost a valued worker in Mrs. Franklin. Livingston county convention was held at Oak Grove where six unions were represented. Howell has thirty new members besides a new Y. The district president's address upon "Our Work" was highly spoken of.

Seventh District held its annual meeting at Carswell. Their president is "an all-around woman." Only a few weeks ago I saw her as presiding officer at the Presbyterian state association. The program was well filled. Mrs. Benjamin gave two addresses, the subject of one, "Famous Women of the National," the other "Then and Now." South union held a meeting in interest of the lumbermen. Miss Bissell, district president, gave a very interesting talk, filling us with the determination that the word discouragement shall be stricken from our minds. A new union was organized at Wheatland of thirteen members, called "Yolande" union. Thus shall we ever keep them in remembrance.

Eighth District.—Saginaw, West Side, duplicate six departments. The East Side are giving much thought to social purity work. The St. Louis Y's are noted for parliamentary order. They have secured the Y. M. C. A. as honoraries, also have charge of a newly organized L. T. L. of forty members. Carson City and Alma and Perrinton are doing good work by mass-meetings. The annual meeting was at St. Louis. Reports from county presidents and superintendents were excellent. Mrs. L. F. Morehouse, superintendent of school of methods at Hackley Park, gave a Bible reading on the Crusade Psalm, and also conducted a model union. Mrs. M. E. Densmore gave echoes of Hackley Park. The children's hour was interesting, Mrs. McClurkin presiding. Greetings were sent to the Presbyterian Synod in conference at Alma.

Tenth district.—West Bay City holds a prayer-meeting every Sunday afternoon in their rooms. Annual convention was held at Vassar. Only four counties are organized. The presidents reported good work done, with Bay county taking the lead. The speakers were, Mrs. McClurkin upon "Open doors"; Mrs. Morehouse upon "Our Methods." The franchise question was ably handled in an address by Mrs. May Knoggs, subject, "The Coming Voter." Two papers on "The Relation of the Reading Room to the W. C. T. U." Mrs. Parish gave a paper upon "How to Report for the Papers." The verdict was a good convention.

Eleventh district.—Their annual convention is called at Charlevoix. The program is well arranged, leading features being an address by Rev. F. L. Thompson, and a Y evening in charge of their flourishing Y's.

Twelfth district—Rallied at Crystal Falls for annual meeting. Day sessions in M. E. Church, evenings at Opera House. Crystal Falls is a mining town and has its full quota of saloons. All but three unions in district represented. Several very excellent papers, one fine original poem were read, and many good things uttered. A new department was taken up and a superintendent appointed for Temple work. The newest union is at Salisbury Mine, twenty-nine active and nineteen honoraries. Stambaugh, Iron River and Republic have flourishing Legions. Wednesday evening the Iron River Y's and Stambaugh Senior L. T. L's rendered a very interesting program. Five graduates received diplomas. Mrs. Verran, for five years in L. T. L. work, is a host. The county banner showing greatest increase in membership, was presented to Marquette county and the Y banner to the Republic Y's.

We have among our membership the woman to whom has come the deserved honor of lady commander of the Maccabees, but she does not forget us, and her valuable paper on "What Shall Be the Attitude of the W. C. T. U. toward Other Organizations," rings with no uncertain sound. "Let us, as philanthropic workers, identify ourselves with educational movements, with clubs, with missionary societies, with fraternal orders, where we can take in knowledge and give out knowledge, and by this secure help to raise and hold up the standard of prohibition which we are trying to hold."

At the first district convention our former state president, Mrs. B. B. Hudson, moved that the following telegram be sent to Mrs. Lathrap: "Rom. 16:6: Greet Mary, who bestowed much labor on us," and our eyes and ears are all turned toward that sick room, and we say with our corresponding secretary, "May the peace that her ministry has brought to so many hearts abide sweetly with her during these crucial days."

MRS. C. H. JOHNSON,
State Reporter, Flint.

CALIFORNIA.

Our state convention was this year held at Sacramento, and as all veteran workers have learned, the county seat is the hardest place in the county to do temperance work, and the capital city the hardest in the state, the success of this particular convention, held on the eve of an exciting election, at this center of political influence, marks a great advance in the standing the cause now occupies.

The convention opened on the stroke of eight with the president, Mrs. Sturtevant-Peet in the chair, according to program. Mrs. Gove, whom we are fond of calling our Elizabeth Fry, so thoroughly is she identified with the interests of them that are in prison, led in prayer, and then, led by our musical conductor, Mrs. S. R. Bailey, the W. C. T. U. hymn by Mrs. Grace Kimball was sung.

Then the welcomes—if we were not a thousand times welcome it was not the fault of those who in such glowing words represented the various organizations.

Sweetest of all the welcomes was, perhaps, the song of the L. T. L., for while the ardent words and stimulating addresses cheered and strengthened us, the faces of these little ones were a comfort, for these are they who are fast coming, better equipped than the earlier forces, to carry on the strife to its successful issue.

The response by Mrs. Rose M. French caught every thought of the welcomes and replied to each so happily, that it was hard to believe that she was speaking extemporaneously to fill the place of an absent member.

In her annual address the president gave a summary of the events most intimately connected with the progress of the temperance reform for the past year or eighteen months, during the financial depression. She alluded to the work Congress had accomplished in its long session and how little real good had been accomplished. She alluded to the ninetieth birthday of Neal Dow, the great temperance worker of Maine, and to the work he had accomplished. She spoke of the action of the three state conventions regarding woman's suffrage and said: "We find ourselves the belles of three parties, and it is a wonder that the Democrats did not also declare themselves in favor of woman's ballot."

Among other incidents she spoke of the part women had taken in defeating Breckinridge in Kentucky, and concluded with a reference to the work of Lady Henry Somerset and the return of Miss Willard to her active life and work.

The reports of the general officers showed a healthful condition of the work throughout the state. That of the corresponding secretary, a marked increase of money used

PROGRESS.

People who get the greatest degree of comfort and real enjoyment out of life, are those who make the most out of their opportunities. Quick perception and good judgment, lead such promptly to adopt and make use of those refined and improved products of modern inventive genius which best serve the needs of their physical being. Accordingly, the most intelligent and progressive people are found to employ the most refined and perfect laxative to regulate and tone up the stomach, liver, and bowels, when in need of such an agent—hence the great popularity of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets. These are made from the purest, most refined and concentrated vegetable extracts, and from forty-two to forty-four are contained in each vial, which is sold at the same price as the cheaper made and more ordinary pills found in the market. In curative virtues, there is no comparison to be made between them and the ordinary pills, as any one may easily learn by sending for a free sample, (four to seven doses) of the Pellets, which will be sent on receipt of name and address on a postal card.

ONCE USED THEY ARE ALWAYS IN FAVOR.

The Pellets cure biliousness, sick and bilious headache, dizziness, costiveness, or constipation, sour stomach, loss of appetite, coated tongue, indigestion, or dyspepsia, windy belchings, "heart-burn," pain and distress after eating, and kindred derangements of the liver, stomach and bowels. Put up in glass vials, therefore always fresh and reliable. One little "Pellet" is a laxative, two are mildly cathartic. As a "dinner pill," to promote digestion, take one each day after dinner. To relieve distress from over-eating, they are unequaled. They are tiny, sugar-coated granules; any child will readily take them.

Accept no substitute that may be recommended to be "just as good." It may be better for the dealer, because of paying him a better profit, but he is not the one who needs help. Address for free sample,

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

The German Reichstag was reopened last week by the Emperor in person.

The lower house of the Austrian diet is considering a bill for the prevention of drunkenness.

The National Council of Switzerland has instituted efforts for international labor regulations.

The Lexow committee in New York is still bringing out evidence of police brutality and corruption.

Delegates assembled in Denver, Monday, for the annual meeting of the American Federation of Labor.

The Chinese Tsungli Yamen (department of foreign affairs) has decided to send an ambassador to Japan to arrange terms of peace.

Senator Peffer has presented a resolution in Congress asking for an investigation to attest the legality of the recent issue of bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Count Ferdinand de Lesseps, the famous builder of the Suez Canal, whose reputation was clouded by his later connection with the Panama Canal frauds, died last Friday at the advanced age of eighty-nine.

A resolution which was referred to the committee on foreign relations has been presented to Congress, asking that this government send a remonstrance to the Turkish government regarding the Armenian cruelties.

The recent sessions of the Grand Lodge of Good Templars at Christiania brought into evidence the fact that the Gothenburg system is a complete failure. It was clearly shown that drunkenness is on the increase under the system.

The whole civilized world is aroused by the details of the terrible atrocities of the Turks upon the Christian Armenians, which have received practical confirmation. America and England have each sent a representative to the court of inquiry. Protests are being published by nearly every Christian organization.

THE American steamship line has it as an invariable rule that no captain or other officer, sailor or other employé, shall use intoxicating liquors as a drink. A famous captain on one of its great lines recently said to one of our leaders, "Many a time has a glass of whisky wrecked a ship."

THE President's annual message published last week, was read with more than usual interest. Its utterances on finance, tariff and foreign affairs were eagerly scanned by members of all political parties, and varied were the comments elicited by the daily press of every shade of political belief. Congress received the message with respectful attention but made no demonstration at the close of the reading.

ON January 1, Dr. Joseph Cook's well-known magazine, Our Day, heretofore published by the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association of Chicago, will be consolidated with the Altruistic Review of Springfield, O. The magazine will bear the double title of Our Day and Altruistic Review. Dr. Cook will be editor-in-chief. Dr. Cuppy, former editor of the Review, and Miss Frances E. Willard will be associate editors. Hail the new combination of editors and magazines!

IT seems to be pretty certain that an arbitration bill will be passed during the present session of Congress. The House committee on labor met Tuesday to consider the arbitration bill which has been pending since last July. One of the provisions of the act is that national labor organizations may file their articles of incorporation at Washington. By so doing the members can more readily invoke the help of the national authorities in cases requiring arbitration.

THE military court of inquiry, called at Columbus to investigate the causes of the terrible riot at Washington Court House, O., early in November, has revealed the fact that the colonel of the regiment, A. B. Coit, and several of the soldiers were drunk and unable to quell the riot. Should the standing army of this country be increased or the drink demon dethroned?

ACCORDING to the President's annual message the total tax collected from distilled spirits in the United States for the year ending June 30, 1894, was $85,259,250.25; on manufactured tobacco, $8,617,898.62, and on fermented liquors, $31,414,788.14, being a total of $125,291,937.51. The estimated deficit in the government for the current year is twenty million dollars on an estimated expenditure of $444,427,784.44. The temperance reformer claims, and prohibition statistics support his statement, that with the reduction of expense consequent on national prohibition there would be a surplus instead of a deficit, even allowing for the elimination of the one hundred and twenty-five million liquor and tobacco tax receipts.

A NOVEL scheme for raising money for a city hospital is to be carried out in San Francisco. The Christmas number of the Examiner will be turned over by the proprietor to a society of ladies, to be entirely managed by them. There will be managing, city, telegraph, society and musical editors, a business manager and full corps of young lady reporters. The entire plant of the paper will, for the time being, be under the control of the ladies and it is anticipated that the sale of the paper will be so large, through curiosity as to the results, that the hospital beneficiary will be greatly enriched. There is no more pleasant and profitable field for women with a "bent" than journalism, it being one place in the competitive world where "wages" are not discriminated in favor of men.

OPPOSITION is in store for the small advance in equal suffrage taken by Ohio in its recent law permitting women to vote at school elections. The act goes in force for the first time in the spring, but many have "taken time by the forelock" and registered this fall. Now comes ex-secretary of state, Daniel Ryan, demanding that the state supervisor of elections strike all the names of "females" from voters' registers! If this is refused, the intricate machinery of the courts will be set in force and mandamus proceedings in the supreme court will darken the limited horizon of the Ohio woman's enfranchisement. All this, it is said, is to test the constitutionality of the new law. Of Buckeye women, however, we can safely prophesy, knowing that the course of reform is strewn with boulders and snags, that they will be watchful and unremittent, prepared with all their might to "hold fast that which is good."

OUR friends in North Dakota must be up and doing, for by the recent election the Republican party has come into complete control of the government and have a majority so large that they can do whatsoever they will. We believe that they will gladly stand by Prohibition in the state if they are not overawed by the party in the nation; but that they will be is almost certain, and as women do not vote (alas, that the Republican Governor Pierce should have vetoed the bill that years ago gave them this power) we can but feel much anxiety in view of the present situation. But in Miss Preston and Miss Bates, both of whom were with us at Cleveland, we have a pair of young women who can cause this to come to pass and who, we believe, will leave no stone unturned to hold their state to its present position on the Prohibition question and to hasten the day when good women can combine forces with good men to make the laws a fair expression of the public opinion of the home as well as of the streets.

HON. W. W. THOMAS, JR., of Portland, Maine, our ex-minister to Sweden and Norway, speaks in a recent interview of the Maine law in the following terms: "I believe the prohibitory law of Maine has done much good. I believe that rum drinking is less in Maine than in Sweden, and in fact, for that matter, that there is much less drinking the world over in these days, largely, I presume, because mankind is growing better. I ought also to say that it is my conviction founded on over thirty years' observation both in this country and in Scandinavia, that the cause of temperance which we all have at heart, has made greater advance in our good state of Maine than it has in either Sweden or Norway."

No well-informed temperance expert doubts but that the ultimate of the war against alcohol is to place its use as a beverage under the ban of international law. The first great step in that direction is to convince and carry individual nations, which as yet has been attempted nowhere but in the United States. No thoughtful student of events can have failed to observe that since Henry W. Blair, of New Hampshire, left the Senate the whole agitation in Congress or for National Prohibition has dropped out of sight as completely as he has himself disappeared from that body. White-ribbon women everywhere have a warm place in their hearts for Henry W. Blair and Eliza N. Blair, his wife. We rejoice in what they were and what they did at the capitol of the nation, and we wish with all our hearts that they were there again. We urge the W. C. T. U. of New Hampshire to do its utmost to help bring about the return of the senator to his old place in the highest legislative body in the Republic. We know that malign influences are against the ex-senator, but we hope yet to see him a leader in that advanced political movement which ere long will unite in one great army, the temperance people, the labor people and the women people of this nation in one irresistible onslaught against existing evils for humanity's sake.

THE advent of John Burns, the great English labor leader, is a significant sign of the times. The wage workers are finding, as the temperance women have already found, that they need to stretch out hands of help across "Old ocean's gray and melancholy waste." The unification of groups of like-minded reformers is the most salient token of ultimate success, for by this means the expert knowledge of the few becomes the world-wide heritage of the many. John Burns is a workingman who by inherent talent and force of character has become the leader of his class, has made his way into Parliament, and stands to-day at the head of the endless labor procession now on the march. He must have had a good mother and a good home, for strange to say, in the midst of the temptation of a workingman's life he is a teetotaller, and has always been one. He has never so much as tasted beer, wine, or spirits of any kind, and he has never used tobacco. As an apprentice boy he often went without a meal that he might buy a book. By trade he is an engineer and a first-class workman. Fifteen years ago or more he became a socialist in the good sense of that term. He does not believe in an appeal to force, but thinks that revolution must come through reform rather than reform through revolution. However, in the early days he was locked up in prison because his fiery philippics against the wealthy class stirred up a tumult. But this was long ago. London has happily found out that to no one man does it owe the moderation of its wage-workers so much as to John Burns. He led the great dock strike and while it was on secured no end of names to the teetotal pledge and held the men in check from committing violence. John Burns has a wife who is worthy of him, and in all their work they are "two souls with but a single thought," and that is the elevation of the wage-worker to a higher plane of living, education, and outlook generally.

IN THE AFTERNOON OF BATTLE.

BY SARA LOUISA OBERHOLTZER.

We have pressed to the front our own to hold
When the battle was fierce and wild;
We have fought for honor in days untold
And then at victory smiled.

We have borne the burden and heat of day,
Knowing its afternoons;
We have seen the golden and seen the gray
And heard life's sweetest tunes.

We have felt the force of answered prayer,
The grief of a helpless cry;
We have lived and moved and had our share
Of what was passing by.

And, well, what next? Is the battle done
That silence reigns supreme?
It is looking back upon fields unwon
That fills the warrior's dream.

It is poise of stroke for grand results,
Of risk and its reward,
That he with his inmost soul consults
As he leans upon his sword.

AUNT HARRIET'S CONTRIBUTION BOX.

BY EMMA HARRIMAN.

Aunt Harriet lives in a narrow, unfashionable street. She is small and unfashionable herself. Six days in the week she stitches away on men's vests and earns six dollars.

Her hair is gray, and her face wrinkled. She is unmarried, a spinster, a maiden lady, an old maid—the title varies according to the person mentioning her.

Years ago she sent away the man she loved—a doctor, long since married, and wealthy—that she might care for the orphaned children of her sister. One was a boy, who borrowed her money and lost it.

She did not tell me these things. She stitches away cheerily and says nothing—about herself.

"There," she said, suddenly, one day, "there is something for my contribution box."

"For what?" I asked, in surprise.

"For my contribution box. You see I sit here alone so much—I don't even keep the traditional cat, it kills birds—that I amuse myself by keeping an imaginary contribution box. Everybody drops something into it. There was the Salvation Army man, I gave him a drink of milk."

"So you believe in the army?"

"They are God's soldiers. Well, he had been wild, English, a sailor, wandered all over the world. Got into the army out here, but first began to think of being a Christian when the women across the ocean came and talked to the sailors. They never saw him converted, but they set him to thinking. A bit of comfort for workers, good as a silver dollar, anyway. I dropped that in."

"How did the army get hold of him?"

"I don't know, but one day he found himself in jail with a lot of others for holding a meeting on the street. At the trial one of them cried, 'Praise the Lord,' at something, and he got ten days extra for that. So they all set to work praying for the judge who sentenced them. One of the men about the jail got converted, and he brought them paint, and they painted mottoes on the wall, 'Come to Jesus' and the like. Give me my scissors, please. There were five converted, but they kept on praying for that judge."

She stopped her busy needle and looked me full in the face.

"Do you believe in prayer?" she asked, shortly.

"Do I what?"

"Oh, of course, we all say we do," returning to her sewing. "Well, that judge fell under deep conviction, and one night got up and went into his cellar to cry to God for mercy. He ran up out of it, shouting praise to God."

"Paul and Silas over again."

"I dropped that in for a gold piece," stopping to thread her needle. "We know it is the same now as then, but we only half believe it after all."

"It must be a cross to you to sit here and sew," I said one day, "when you would so much enjoy active Christian work."

"Sometimes, yes," then turning the conversation quickly away from herself, "did you ever think how many kinds of crosses there are? Some carry great wooden ones, gilded for show. Some little iron ones, so heavy they bury themselves in the flesh and fester there. Some carry two and always speak of the large showy one that is light, to attract attention from the small one that is heavy."

"Put that in your box," said I.

She laughed and snapped the vest she was making out before her to shake off the threads.

"Do you believe the angels come here about us?" she asked a little later, abruptly.

"'Are they not all ministering spirits—'"

"Yes, I know, but did you ever know of one? A woman was here yesterday who told me of a lady, wife of a rich mine owner, who spends thousands every year for the poor. She dreamed three times in one night that if she went along a certain street across the creek she would find a mother and children starving. She went out before daylight and found them, though she thought she knew the locality and people and that there were no such persons. Now, did an angel tell her?"

"It may be, why not?"

"To be sure, why not? Evidently the Lord will send us where He wants us if we keep ready and listen. That's a double eagle, I put that in. You know Mrs. Love, wife of that sick minister. She got up one morning and on the frontier with not a mouthful for breakfast. But she built the fire and put on the kettles and told her husband they'd have prayers before breakfast. A man knocked at the door before they were off their knees. He said he'd had no peace all night because the Lord had kept telling him to get up and take them food. He doesn't forget. I was afraid I wouldn't have room for much more, that filled up the box so. She comes by her strength of faith honestly, her mother was like that. There is heredity in religion as well as in drunkenness. Her mother was in the West. They'd had drouth and grasshoppers, everything. The children were barefooted and there was only a little mouldy wheat to eat. Then a letter came to her from a friend who sent money and said, 'I don't know what is the trouble, but I haven't been able to sleep on account of concern for you and so am up writing at three in the morning. Let me know if you need help.'"

"That looks like angels."

"Yes, and if we trusted more He'd send more."

"But why should He let His children suffer so?"

"We can't tell. If a child doesn't listen his mother takes his toy, not to make him cry, but for attention and obedience. I think God does like that. A general marches his men through swamps and marshes and over mountains. Some sicken and die. He isn't compelling them to march because he wants them to suffer, but he has an end in view. We must simply obey and march on."

"You must put that in your box."

"Oh, I've put it in so often it's like the nickels in a church collection. And there's another thing. While we are marching we must see that our uniforms don't get so dusty we'll be mistaken for the enemy."

"Yes, that is a terrible danger. And isn't it dreadful the way boys are being ruined all the time? Pits are being dug for them on every hand."

"Yes, and then some people who ought to know better talk as if it couldn't be helped; as if they must sow their wild oats. Parents take care of their daughters carefully and let their sons go to the devil. Don't wince. That is just what I mean. It's where they go and no questions asked. If you planted a lot of Washington navels and I Mediterranean sweets, you cared for yours and I neglected mine, it wouldn't be fair to say mine failed because they were Mediterranean sweets. You would say they needed the cultivating and irrigating yours had had. That's the way it is with boys and girls, and the fault doesn't all lie with the mothers by any means."

"Well, this is a hard old world anyway, a sort of treadmill. Don't you ever get tired of making vests?"

She snipped off her twist as she finished a buttonhole and laughed, her laugh full of sweet content someway.

"Tired, oh, yes. I used to hate it and fret and fume, and make myself uncomfortable, but I've learned better. I used to say it was a treadmill. So it is, but it seems different now. When I was a child I saw horses in a sort of a square box with a floor made of rollers. It was set up slanting. A man stood beside them cracking his whip. They scrambled up to the higher end of the box, the rollers turned and back they slipped. The whip cracked. They tried it again and slipped back as the rollers turned. How I pitied those horses. I said as I grew older, 'That is life. The whip cracks, we scramble up for fear of getting our feet caught, or feeling the lash, then back we slip only to repeat it.' But later I remembered the band that went out from a wheel those rollers turned, to a machine that was sawing wood all day. Those poor horses scrambling up and slipping back instead of doing nothing were preparing fuel for a hundred families. We don't like to feel the whip but I believe we're turning a wheel with a band on it that goes out to something if we can't see it."

"It seems strange that God can use us at all, we are such faulty creatures."

"Yes, but He does. Even Peter swore and what a sermon he preached at Pentecost."

"And do you think all of us are just where we ought to be?"

"Possibly not, we can't tell. It certainly doesn't seem so. 'Every man finds his level,' would be true if all had equal opportunity. But 'some higher good may come from seeming ill.'"

I took Mrs. Gay with me to see Aunt Harriet one day.

"I had such a strange dream last night," she said to me, after Mrs. Gay had told her of last night's party and the handsome suits of the Jenkins girls, the afternoon tea for the next day and the bishop's reception. "I had such a strange dream. A gray-haired woman was making a garden. A bent, old man was talking with her.

"'What are you doing, my daughter?' he asked.

"'I am making my garden.'

"'But you are digging up all your flowers.'

"'Yes!'

"'Why?'

"'I shall plant thistle, and nettle and wormwood.'

"'Why, my daughter?' he asked again.

"'I am weary of trying to grow flowers. I had the fragrant heliotrope the first year and the frost killed it. Then I planted lilies and the wind broke their stalks. After that it was violets and pansies but the hot sun blighted them. I tried roses and the worms ate out their hearts.'

"'That is life, my daughter,' said the old man.

"And she answered, 'life is bitterness.'

"'No, my daughter, not unless we are bitter. Remember you had the color, the perfume, the delight in the few perfect forms and now you have the memory. Never plant thistles, my daughter.'

"The old man walked on and the woman stopped digging up her roses."

"Well," said Mrs. Gay as we drove off, "of all the strange, outlandish, old creatures. I don't see what you see in the old thing. Long as a rail and wearing a stripe, blue, too, and she dark as a Spaniard."

"But, Mrs. Gay, you know 'souls have complexions too,' as George Eliot said."

"Elliott, what Elliott? not the young man? I saw them out driving yesterday, he has such a handsome span o bays and his wife has a new imported suit and—what are you laughing at?"

A DREAM.

BY MRS. EVA HORTON.

I dreamed a mighty giant whom the people loved lay sick. And men gathered about him in groups as he reclined and listened to his pulse-beats and watched his breathing. Yet no two groups seemed agreed as to his malady nor as to the treatment he required.

As I looked more closely I saw with horror a huge vampire nestling to him, constantly drawing his heart's blood; yet, strange to say, but few of the multitude of men gathered around the giant seemed to recognize in this creature the cause of his malady. Some few, indeed, made occasional efforts to draw it away, and one small group seemed intent upon killing it, but all their efforts were ineffectual because one of the two larger groups seemed to regard the vampire as something to be protected instead of killed. The other large group seemed either utterly careless of or oblivious to the creature.

"Why don't you kill that vampire?" I shouted to both these great parties of men.

"Vampire!" returned the one laughing. "Vampire! That's no vampire; that's the goose that lays the golden eggs!" And he pointed to what I had not noticed before, a great glowing heap of golden eggs on the other side of the giant.

"Vampire?" said the other great party. "Vampire? Sh-sh-sh! Do you see yonder thicket close by? A tiger's there which will spring if we touch the creature. It would better be a vampire that kills him than a tiger."

Just then I noticed that from multitudes of homes women were watching the scene with evident agitation, some opening their windows and calling to the men to kill the vampire. They seemed so eager and so earnest that I wondered why they did not go near enough to make the men hear, for little heed seemed paid to them.

I asked them why they did not go out and help, and they pointed to their casements. Then I saw that they were prisoners in their homes, for across each casement were the hard iron bars of law and the strong silken bars of custom. Yet, though these women were prisoners, they watched the scene with unabated interest, and when the two great parties of men flourished their clubs to keep the tariff and silver bugaboos (which were flying like mosquitoes about the head of the giant) away, these women called to them to join forces and kill the vampire. From those barred casements went petition after petition, trying to turn the attention of the men to the blood-drinking beast in the beloved giant's bosom. In them they set pennants of white, inscribed, "For God and Home and Native Land," to which they ever and anon pointed with earnest gaze.

"Ah!" thought I, in my dream, "were these women free, they would strike straight at the vampire."

And I cried to the men again:

"Why don't you unbar the casements and let your women help?"

"No, no, no!" came a chorus in reply. "What would become of the home?" "Who'd rock the cradle?" "They would grow so masculine." "They would want all the offices." "The bad women would come too." "They would grow so independent they wouldn't marry."

The vampire itself lifted its ugly head and shot its red tongue out spitefully, and in the babel of voices I awoke.

The Waifs' Mission.

BY BERTHA DAMARIS KNOBE.

One never knows what great possibilities lie latent neath the tattered coat of the bootblack and news vender—the ubiquitous offspring of the slums. For this reason these picturesque gamins of the street, with their never ending "Morning papers" and "Shine, sir?" are a peculiar study worthy of consideration.

To take these unfortunate children, tossed upon the shores of pauperism and crime and, ere their young feet have too long traveled in the paths of depravity, give them one honest chance to become self-respecting, self-supporting men—this is the noble purpose of the Waifs' Mission and Manual Training School with headquarters at 44 State street.

This organization is unique in the history of philanthropies. Though its guiding principles are peculiar to itself, its complete understanding of boy-nature accounts for its extensive influence. There are many homes here and elsewhere for the children of the street—that innumerable army—but the Waifs' Mission strikes deeper than the ordinary organization, in that it makes the street gamin self-supporting as well as self-respecting. The result is that very few of the youths who come within the influence of the Mission and leave it fitted for an honorable pursuit in life, drift back to the old haunts of street life. In fact, it is said on indisputable authority that this Mission is the only organization of the kind in the world. The De Almbert school in Paris is founded on a similar principle.

The scope of this humanitarian work can better be appreciated by a tour of the different departments. For the religious phase, then, one should be a visitor at Cavalry Armory, on Michigan avenue, some Sunday afternoon. Here, Sunday-school is conducted for members of the Mission and their boy and girl friends of the street, whom they invite to share this weekly privilege.

It is, indeed, a novel if pitiable sight. Six hundred of as irrepressible children, grimy for the most part, as this metropolis can turn out, collect in this hall in eager anticipation of a respite from the usual everyday work on the crowded thoroughfare. It is a cosmopolitan company of every nationality. Many are bright-faced, happy for the moment at least, while others bear the sullen insignia of inbred perverseness. Two little girls—mere toddling babies—lead this peculiarly interesting band of children in processional march round and round the great hall. The strains of an orchestra add to their keen enjoyment.

The next feature of the Sunday-school is a decided innovation—edibles. But surely the way to a boy's heart is by his stomach, and the two long tables with white cloth and food doubtless prove a superior attraction even to the lively music. Finally each one finds a place at the table, hats are doffed and heads bowed and words of blessing are spoken. The edibles disappear with rapidity and the children congregate into classes.

It is really surprising to note how much some and how little others of the street Arabs know of the Bible. Though confusion reigns supreme the lesson of the day is instilled into their darkened lives. Happy songs are sung, a suggestive one having this verse which comes in lusty tones from hundreds of throats accustomed to crying the daily papers.

"'Suffer the children to come unto me,'
These words He spake beside blue Galilee;
Not the rich only His sweet message greets,
Jesus loves even the waifs of the streets.
Shout the glad news to each one you meet,
Jesus loves even the waifs of the street."

After the dismissal of the children a talk with the leading spirit of the work, Mr. Taylor E. Daniels, revealed many points of great interest. On the way to the waifs' home on State street on this particular afternoon, Mr. Daniels was asked for a brief résumé of the origin and propagation of the unique underlying idea of the organization. This was his interesting story told with that unmistakable enthusiasm of a man who has surrendered his life to the consummation of a noble ideal: "Several years ago I was a prosperous miller making my thousands of dollars annually. After my conversion I caught the slumming fever. It was during one of these tours among the hovels of unfortunates that I was impressed with the need to do something for the young offspring of vicious parentage who had, either because of death or desertion, no home other than the cheerless home of the streets of a great city. My idea was not merely to furnish a place for these outcasts to eat and sleep, as do many of the newsboys' refuges, but on the truism that 'an idle brain is the devil's workshop,' it was my purpose to fit these children for an honorable place in the ranks of industry—in other words, to train each in the line of work for which he had some inclination. To my mind, the first great step in a boy's education, and particularly the education of a waif, is to give him work that will make him self-supporting. The youth is thus a help instead of a hindrance.

"So the Waifs' Mission is not charitable. The boys who have passed from the school-room are paid regular wages in one of the departments. They are taught the principles of economy and there is much friendly rivalry as to who shall have the largest account in the First National bank of Chicago. The work for the past year is very naturally a matter of pride. The different departments of the Mission earned nineteen thousand dollars, that year, and with expenses twenty-four thousand dollars, the public was drawn upon for only five thousand dollars. Of course, in time it is hoped to more than make expenses. But here we are at the Mission."

Climbing the stairs of a building, strangely time-worn, in the heart of modern Chicago, one comes to the second floor—the "first floor" of the Mission Home. Here is a school-room, where the younger members of the home study the common branches, either during the day or at night—whenever they are free from selling papers on the street. As soon as they are through the course of study they are either given work in one of the departments or elsewhere in the city. Some are found good homes in the country.

On this same floor is the dining-room, where boy-appetites are satiated with clocklike regularity three times a day during each of the three hundred and sixty-five days of the year. On the other side of the hall is a room with all the necessary paraphernalia for printing. Besides regular job work, The American Youth, an unusually interesting paper for young people, is turned out each week. This department furnishes employment to quite a number of members of the home, and gives them a trade for life.

The express and messenger service occupies the room to the front. This is the latest addendum to the enterprises of the Mission, and gives employment to many more. The shoe department, started in the beginning—ten years ago—became so extensive that it was moved to the country some time ago. A new department is contemplated by Superintendent Daniels in the near future. And thus the good work goes on.

On the floor above is the dormitory. Clean, inviting beds will accommodate eighty-six weary heads when the shades of night fall—heads that would otherwise have only the covering of the heavens. There are also baths to aid in the inculcation of the principle that cleanliness is next to godliness.

These are, in brief, the home, educational, industrial and religious phases of home missionary work as embodied in the Waifs' Mission. From small beginnings has the much been accomplished. On every hand, however, are evidences that the Mission is not only outgrowing present quarters, but that its increasing popularity makes added facilities an absolute necessity. In fact, the building, which is old, must inevitably succumb to the march of the nineteenth century laborer—and then, what? Shall the inmates be turned loose on the highroad of professional criminality; or will philanthropists of Chicago heed the cry for the wherewithal to erect a building worthy of the cause?

Superintendent Daniels has for some time had in mind an ideal Waifs' Home and Training School, and indeed steps have been taken towards its fulfillment. In this ideal refuge he would have a place of detention and a court for youthful malefactors, where many an innocent lad would escape the corrupting influences ot the average police courts. This much needed innovation for youthful offenders immediately commends itself. Furthermore, this ideal edifice would be a home for waifs, a workshop, a school, with reading-room, public gymnasium, free baths and an employment bureau. With the motto, "Attempt great things for God; expect great things of God," Superintendent Daniels is working zealously in this great work on behalf of the friendless wanderer of the street.

When it is considered that there are ten thousand ragged, wretched waifs in the city of Chicago who will be men to-morrow, ten thousand waifs who may carve their names in places of honor or dye them in infamy, this child problem becomes one of the vital questions of the hour—a question that relates not merely to the individual life of the gamin of the street, but to the civic life of the city of Chicago.

THE RECENT NEW YORK CITY ELECTION.

BY MRS. C. B. HOPKINS.

There is a wide-spread misunderstanding in regard to the reform victory won in this city and state on November 6. Not a few good people seem to think that the great struggle for good government has ended, and that a political millennium will be ushered in when the newly elected officials assume office on January 1. On the other hand, many good Prohibitionists see clearly the vantage ground that the saloon has gained, and positively refuse to see anything else. There is need of a clear analysis of the results of the recent election.

It is necessary, to fully appreciate what has been accomplished, to glance at the kind of government that Tammany has been giving us in recent years. The infamy of this political organization is world-wide. Every well-read American knows that it is corrupt—that it has for years squandered the city's money, debauched the suffrage, and kept in power, by the most systematic and persistent fraud, as high-handed a gang of robbers as ever preyed upon a civilized community. When the Lexow committee began its investigation the people of New York were prepared for an exposure of corruption of a general character, but the disclosures of the past three months have astounded even the harshest critic.

It has been shown that notorious defaulters and murderers have been appointed to the most responsible offices; that through bribery saloon licenses have been granted to the most notorious criminals; that systematic tribute has been levied and protection guaranteed to the vilest dens of prostitution; that green-goods men have been allowed to ply their unlawful business provided they handed over a part of their ill-gotten gains; that quacks and physicians have been allowed to practice abortion after paying hush money to the city officials; and that thieves and forgers—in short, criminals of every grade—have been protected by the district attorney's office.

Beyond a doubt the recent election will put an end to this startling condition. Not only this, but the adoption of the new constitution, in which New York city took an honorable part, has instituted a series of reforms for which there has been long and patient agitation. The prohibition of pool selling, book-making, and all other forms of gambling, including lotteries, is a great moral victory. A great single gain is the separation of municipal from state elections, so that beginning with 1896, state officials will be chosen in the even numbered years and the city officials in the odd numbered years.

Another section of the first consequence is that which prohibits the use of public money in the aid of sectarian schools. Radical changes are made in the judicial system, designed to effect the more prompt and certain administration of the laws. The long standing abuse of the naturalization laws is abolished by the requirement that an alien must be a citizen for ninety days before voting instead of ten, which will effectually stop the rush for papers just before election. The issue of passes and franks by railroads, telegraph or telephone companies to public officers is not only forbidden, but the offending official "shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall forfeit his office at the suit of the attorney general." Other reforms of minor consequence include the requirement that civil service reform principles shall be followed; the prohibition of riders on appropriation bills, and the requirement that legislative bills shall be printed for three days before passage; the preservation of the state forests and the abolition of the old rule that no more than five thousand dollars damages shall be recoverable in case of death by accident.

All good people should rejoice at these victories, whatever their politics may be. But in our hour of thanksgiving it is well to take note that we still have the saloon—ten thousand strong—with us and that this legalized institution has largely bred the corruption that has disgraced the city. It is a sad thing to reflect upon that even in the campaign just passed, the liquor dealers were powerful enough to force the anti-Tammany leaders into a deal that will, unless pledges are broken, give the saloon-keepers a Sunday liquor law and other modifications of the present excise system for which they have been working for years.

The situation can be briefly summed up. Apparently great reform victories have been won. The church—led by Dr. Parkhurst—and the good women of New York have temporarily triumphed. The saloon, the arch corrupter, is alert, determined and dominant. If the victories already gained are to be held and if the victors are to march forward, Christian men and women must continue their hard practical work. It is possible for the reform government of New York to be an uplifting force throughout the nation. But if this opportunity is neglected the criminal element, which has so long ruled this great metropolis, will again be in the saddle stronger than ever.

New York City.

CORRESPONDENCE

"A PRIMITIVE PROHIBITIONIST."

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—I have just read in a late copy of THE UNION SIGNAL th article entitled as above, by Martha Young, of Alabama, with considerable satisfaction, inasmuch as the article gives honor to a man belonging to a race which very seldom gets either honor or justice done to it. We have heard so often that "all that has ever been done for temperance in our country has been done by the Republican party," composed, of course, of white and black folks, that it is really refreshing to have a writer come and claim for an Indian the authorship of "the first total abstinence pledge penned in America for presentation to a proposed association."

Without wishing, however, to detract in the least from the honor due the good Cherokee, Yon-Na-Gusha, who in 1830, in North Carolina, presented such a pledge to his tribe and secured the signature of nearly all his people, I am compelled to correct the claim made for him, by facts of history, which give the honor to Indians living in Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, a hundred years before he did. In Vol. I, of the Pennsylvania Archives may be found the following record:

ALLEGHANY, March 15, 1737.

This day we held a council and it was agreed by the Sheynars in general, that whatever rum is in our towns shall be broken and spilled, and not drank, and whoever shall bring any rum, or any sort of strong liquor, into our towns, Indian or white man, let it be more or less, it shall be broken and spilled in the presence of the whole towns, wheresoever it is brought; and four men are appointed fo every town to see that there is no rum or strong liquor brought into our towns, and to have it for the term of four years from date.

(Signed) LAYPAREAWAH, Opehasa's Son,
NEWCHUONER, Deputy King,
COYEACOLINNE, Chief Council,
And ninety-seven others.

Over in Massachusetts the Stockbridge Indians passed a resolution in 1733 that there should be "no trading in rum" among them. In 1839 the church of fifty members which the devoted missionary, John Sergeant, had gathered together from among them, dedicated its building, and among other exercises of the day unanimously ratified the tribe's prohibition law, adding heavy penalties for any violation of it, thus becoming not only the real "primitive prohibitionists" of our land, but the first prohibition church, whose righteousness covered their politics as well as their creed. In a measure, however, John Eliot's "Praying Indians" take precedence over even these Stockbridges. In 1654 three of these "Praying Indians" got drunk, and catching a boy belonging to one of their leading brethren in the church they put the oottle to his lips and made him drink until he, too, was drunk. Because of this the whole church grieved more deeply even than if these men had died. Eliot said it was "the greatest frown of God he had ever met in his work," yet he deemed it wise to refer the matter of discipline to the church itself. The head men met in council, and after mature deliberation passed the following sentence: "That the three offenders should sit in the stocks a long time, be taken thence to the whipping-post and receive each twenty lashes; and that the boy, for having gone where the men could give him whisky, should sit in the stocks a little while, and then be taken by his father before all the children at school and there whipped." This sentence was duly carried out, notwithstanding one of the offenders was Eliot's interpreter and friendly helper, thereby enacting discipline for intemperance which beats by a long way white folks' modern method of simply putting "temperance in the discipline." RED, WHITE AND BLUE.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—In your issue of November 15, the article on "The Red, White and Blue" attracted my special consideration. I wondered what version of "Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean," was used at Uncle William's Fourth of July celebration, and wished he had quoted the entire poem, for that wine cup stanza is new to me. But after reading his comments I hunted up an old song book of 1868 in which I find the piece with the last stanza as he describes it. It is there credited to a previous publication, so this form is perhaps the original autograph. I would condemn its use as strongly as Uncle William. We cannot be too careful in excluding from our songs every vestige of sentiment that favors the use of alcoholic beverages.

But I wish to remind the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL that there are revised versions of this good old song. I have sung the piece again and again with my pupils of several different communities. We used the words as contained in the "School Room Chorus" and in the "Franklin Square Song Collection, Number 1," and there is no alcohol in either copy.

Some parts of this poem are rather ambiguous, but there is undoubted patriotism in "Three cheers for the Red, White and Blue," etc.

The following is the song as found in the "Franklin Square Collection." It differs from the "School Room Chorus" in the third stanza only.

Oh, Columbia, the gem of the ocean.
The home of the brave and the free,
The shrine of each patriot's devotion,
A world offers homage to thee.
Thy mandates make heroes assemble,
When Liberty's form stands in view;
Thy banners make tyranny tremble
When borne by the red, white and blue.

CHORUS—When borne by the red, white and blue,
When borne by the red, white and blue,
Thy banners make tyranny tremble,
When borne by the red, white and blue.

When war winged its wide desolation,
And threaten'd the land to deform,
The ark then of freedom's foundation,
Columbia rode safe thro' the storm.
With the garlands of victory around her,
When so proudly she bore her brave crew,
With her flag proudly floating before her,
The boast of the red, white and blue.

CHORUS—The boast of the red, white and blue,
The boast of the red, white and blue,
With her flag proudly floating before her
The boast of the red, white and blue.

The star-spangled banner bring hither,
O'er Columbia's true sons let it wave;
May the wreaths they have won never wither,
Nor its stars cease to shine on the brave.
May the service united ne'er sever,
But hold to their colors so true;
The army and navy forever,
Three cheers for the red, white and blue.

CHORUS—Three cheers for the red, white and blue,
Three cheers for the red, white and blue,
The army and navy forever,
Three cheers for the red, white and blue.

SOCIAL PURITY VICTORY IN LONDON.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—A great effort is being made in England to purify the stage, and to restrict the licenses granted to theaters, where the amusements have long been considered as having a decidedly sinful tendency.

Active among these workers for the advancement of social purity have been the temperance women of England, joining with the others who desired that certain promenades, dancing and stage plays should be no longer licensed. They have most heroically demanded this action on the part of the county council, and a complete victory in their recent appeal has been won! The question reached a climax when Mr. George Edwards applied for a renewal of a license for music and dancing for the Empire Theater. The licensing committee recommended that a license for music and dancing be granted upon the following conditions, to be indorsed on the license:

"That the promenades be abolished which have proven to be most pernicious in their practice, and also that no intoxicating drink be sold in the auditorium."

Mr. Murphy protested against this, as he had a place where both these liberties were allowed. Mrs. Chant made a most able reply to Mr. Murphy. She had herself investigated the evil that was engendered by the so-called "promenade." She had, by ocular proof, seen that it was a hot-bed of iniquity! She and her friends wished, therefore, to do away with that. She told Mr. Murphy that "he had given away his case when he said 'that if the promenade was done away with and the sale of whisky stopped in the auditorium, ruin would fall on the Empire.' He had explained by his own arguments that the sale of drink was what enabled him to pay so large a dividend. She wanted to see the amusements in London conducted in such a manner that people could assemble for social happiness; where the husband and wife could meet together; where a man could take his children without fear." This, and a great deal more was added to pray the council not to lead men and women into temptation, but to do away with these hot-beds of vice. Mrs. Chant argued that the day when the theaters could be thus purged, would be the day of the Magna Charta of public amusements.

Much animated discussion followed; and much opposition was aroused to the efforts made by the workers for social purity to carry their point.

The original question was then put before the House. It was divided into two sections "A" and "B." Section A reading thus: "That the promenades be abolished, and the spaces now occupied by them be disposed of to satisfaction of the council," was first voted upon. Forty-four votes were recorded in favor, and twenty-two against it.

For section B: "That no intoxicating drinks be sold in the auditorium," forty-three voted in favor and twenty-one against it. Thus another triumph is won for the cause of social purity and for the army of the W. C. T. U.

On Sunday, as if following in the same trend of thought, Mr. Stead called a great mass-meeting such as he caused to be assembled in Chicago on various occasions. His object was to form a Social National Union, the chief purpose of whose members is to guard the elections so that honest and good men would be elected. Mr. Stead chiefly directed his discourse to the necessities which were going to arise in the schools where it was particularly necessary to have upright men who would correct some of the evils which now existed, where hundreds of Christ's little ones were crowded together into rooms striving to store their minds whilst their bodies were often starving.

He begged that "the London school board" should be made up of men who would see to it that many present evils no longer existed.

The gentleman presiding over the meeting was the foreman of the jury who once condemned Mr. Stead to nine months' imprisonment!

Mrs. Chant made an earnest appeal for the welfare of the suffering to be considered, and to get good men elected at the coming election so the best public good could be attained.

It was a most enthusiastic meeting and culminated in the formation of the Social National Union and the adoption of resolutions or a constitution for action that will be like the cleansing influence of civic elections, and public benefaction will ensue therefrom. A committee of officers was then appointed, consisting of leading men of London, Mrs. Chant and Lady Henry Somerset.

I find Lady Somerset's name interwoven here into the warp and the woof of each aspiration for good. It is plain to be seen that she dwells in the hearts of her countrymen and women as a noble woman devoted to good works. MARY FROST ORMSBY.

ALCOHOL AND HAPPINESS.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—I beg to call the attention of your readers to an article in the November number of the Popular Science Monthly, bearing the title, "Alcohol and Happiness." The article is a synopsis of a lecture given at Berne, by Dr. Justus Gaule, of the University of Zürich. Dr. Gaule is an eminent physiologist and an authority in his department of science; therefore whatever he says on the subject of alcohol is entitled to our earnest consideration. The destructive nature of alcohol is now well known, but Dr. Gaule's analysis of the question from the standpoint of the physiological psychologist has practically the ring of a new argument, the thunder of a new voice, from the realm of science. The words of the distinguished Zürich professor have force because the "majesty of fact" is on his side, and in listening to him we understand, as perhaps never before, how it is that the alcohol habit is so squarely opposed to manliness and happiness. Surely the W. C. T. U. around the world owes a debt of gratitude to Dr. Gaule for his brave and able teaching of the truth that is to make us free.

THE HOP QUESTION AGAIN.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Perhaps your correspondent could better understand how some poor W. C. T. U. and church women can pick hops were she placed in their circumstances. I think a mother would be wanting in the commonest instincts of humanity who would choose for herself and family, cold, hunger, exposure and death rather than to procure things needful through picking hops (or any other labor where an honest equivalent is rendered) which your correspondent thinks is equivalent to money received from the saloon-keeper over the bar.

I live in one of the hop centers of West Washington, have watched this business from a temperance standpoint for years, and confess that when I felt that necessity compelled me I have picked hops, for which I have never felt condemnation, and I have an average good conscience. But when that necessity was removed, I felt it my duty to give place to others more needy.

But I have no excuse to offer for the hop growers who, coming here, have absorbed our best agricultural lands and nearly turned our fruitful valleys into hop yards, thereby excluding largely every other industry that might give employment to the poor laboring men and women that the ebb tide of prosperity has left stranded upon our coast. I claim that there is a distinction with a difference between the hop-raiser and the hop-picker regarding the morale of this question.

And now, dear sisters, at whose door the wolf is not howling and to whom more agreeable remuneration and, perhaps, less doubtful avenues of employment are open, be sparing in your judgment against your less fortunate sister and brother, whose "lines are not cast in pleasant places." Whom the greed of the monopolist, the canker worm of interest and unjust taxation largely have compelled to brave the exposure, fatigue and unremunerating labor of picking hops "for the money there is in it," viz.: an average of from fifty to sixty-five cents per day.

As for hop-growing being a money making business here, the experiences of this and past years have not proved it so to be, many fine yards remaining unpicked for want of money to pick them, in some cases the expense of tillage causing an additional mortgage plaster to be placed upon their already heavily mortgaged farms, placed there mainly by money advanced by the hop merchants. You can calculate for yourself how long at this rate it will take to break up all the small producers. I sometimes think that we cannot do a better thing for this hop-cursed country than to all turn in, pick and cultivate their hops and break them up as soon as possible, and use the beer money to do it with.

To My Dear Comrades of the National W. C. T. U.:

You do not know how touched I was by your tender remembrance of me in my absence. A GREETING FROM MRS. LEAVITT.

To the Members of the Twenty-first Convention of the National W. C. T. U. recently held in Cleveland, O.

DEAR SISTERS:—Your delightful telegram to me, dated November 20, last, this moment, November 30, reached me in Vera Cruz; hence the impossibility of reply during Convention.

This is the first breath of Convention news, and the only one that has reached me yet. Still I know that the recently vacated chair of our beloved, honored and trusted Mrs. Woodbridge must have cast a sadness over all your sessions.

With warmest thanks for the impulse to send and for the message, I hope and pray that the work of the Convention may be blessed to our union, and to our nation in a greater degree than any that has preceded it.

Affectionately your friend,

MARY CLEMENT LEAVITT.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN EDUCATIONAL ENTERPRISE.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—About forty years ago a missionary with his wife and children started from India in a sailing vessel bound for Cape Colony. He was coming to the Cape to regain his strength, but died on the voyage before Cape Town was reached. His widow with six children landed at Cape Town intending to go on to America when a vessel should leave.

Mrs. Hume was kindly received by the Rev. Thompson and his daughter, who proved true friends and Mrs. Hume became acquainted among others with the Misses Elliot who had a school at Mowbray. Mrs. Hume told them of Mt. Holyoke Seminary in America; Miss Catharine Elliot became so much interested that she resolved sometime to go to America to visit the school, and after years did go. While there she felt very much the need of a similar school in South Africa.

On her return home she brought with her a copy of the life of Mary Lyon, the founder and first principal of Mt. Holyoke Seminary. She sent that book to the Rev. Andrew Murray, at Wellington, and it was in reading it in December, 1872, on the rocks at Kalk Bay, that Mr. Murray was led to believe that Cape Colony was in need of such an institution as that founded by Mary Lyon.

At a conference held at Wellington in 1872 a proposal was made to erect some monument in memory of the French refugees who had settled in this part of the country. Mr. Murray suggested that the monument should take the form of an institution which, while it stood in memory of our ancestors, should prove a lasting blessing to their descendants. There were many who favored this proposal, and a letter was sent to Mt. Holyoke Seminary asking for a teacher.

Meantime the angels were very busy carrying petitions for guidance up to the throne of grace. Some months later a letter from America came to the Rev. Andrew Murray expressing much sympathy and interest, and proposing to send two teachers instead of one. With gratitude to God and those who loved Him, the offer of two teachers was gladly accepted. On the 25th of September, 1873, a public meeting was held in the church of Wellington and plans and prospects laid before the people. It was stated then that at least £2,000 would be needed, and that it would be desirable to have £1,000 in hand before beginning the work. It was not long before the congregation came forward with £1,150.

A committee was formed to choose a suitable spot for a South African "Mt. Holyoke Seminary." The place which seemed most suitable was then in the hands of the Anabaptists who had no intention of parting with it. No other place could be found. Building was thought of, and while still praying for guidance the much desired property was unexpectedly offered for sale for £1,600. As this was a decided answer to prayer the place was at once purchased and the work of refitting commenced.

In the same month of June letters were received from America, stating that the first teachers, Miss Ferguson and Miss Bliss, were preparing to sail on September 20 and hoped to be here about the middle of November, and on the 15th of that month there was great joy in welcoming them to South Africa.

On October 26, 1873, while the synod of the Dutch Reformed church was in session at Cape Town, the building designed for the seminary was formally taken possession of. Many ministers from all parts of the Colony and a great number of people gathered together under the very trees which now adorn the seminary grounds. Stirring words were spoken and earnest prayers sent up for God's blessing to rest on the work about to be commenced. Before everything was ready there were more applicants than places for them.

We who are now in a seminary twenty years old can scarcely realize what it must have been to those new girls who had no old girls to help them, to explain the bells, domestic work and the numberless other details which are so necessary to seminary life.

On the first evening the pupils met in the library for the first "recess meeting." They seemed to think it very strange, but learned to love very much this hour of prayer. God's presence in the school was manifested from the beginning; during the first quarter all the pupils took their stand on the Lord's side.

Applications came in rapidly, and the classes became so large that it was decided to send for more teachers. Two new teachers were welcomed at the end of the first year. From that time teachers have been coming and going nearly every year.

It was found necessary to build a new house, as room was very much needed; the seminary pledged to supply half the amount. In 1874 a large bazaar was held, which brought in £220; the same day the corner-stone of the new building, Murray Hall, was laid. The building was finished during the next year, and opened July 27. School work went steadily forward. The close of 1878 was of special interest, as it saw the first graduating class of the Huguenot Seminary. There were four graduates, and their motto was, "Except the Lord build the house they labor in vain that build it."

In 1885 the good news was received that two thousand pounds had been given to Miss Cummings, one of the teachers, by Mr. E. A. Goodnow, for a much needed hall. The gift was afterwards increased to three thousand pounds and the woodwork was sent from America. Great was the consternation when a telegram announced one morning the wreck of the Olga R. off Mouille Point, for the Olga R. had the materials for Goodnow Hall on board. But the sea yielded up its treasures and nearly everything of value was saved. This building was finished in 1886.

During the last few years the seminary has grown very much. In 1890 the branch institution at the Paarl was established and two more branches have been started at Grey Town, Natal, and Bethlehem in the Orange Free State.

When we look over these twenty years of the Huguenot Seminary, and think of all it has and is to accomplish; of the many teachers whose memories will always be treasured, of the well-nigh one thousand girls who have dwelt here, many of them now wives and mothers, training their children and holding positions of influence in society, and others now teachers carrying out what they learned at the Huguenot Seminary, when we remember that about thirty have gone out as missionaries, is it not evident that the progress of the seminary has been upward as well as forward? If this school had not been dedicated to God at first could we have expected the same result?

GERTRUDE KEET.

Wellington, Cape Colony, Africa.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

And my speech and my preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the spirit and of power: That your faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God.—I. Cor. 2: 4, 5.

It seems to me we are living in such an age of materialism that it is hard to believe in anything that we do not see, touch and handle. Christians seem to forget that the most potential forces are the hidden and unseen. We would all accomplish greater things if we were clothed with more faith. Hebrews eleventh should be read by all Christians much oftener than it is. It is a pleasure to receive such a letter as the following from one who walks by faith and not by sight: "I am glad," writes Mrs. L. H. Hyslop, Nebraska City, Neb., "and thankful to be able to send the contents, $3.65, of another mite-box this year. I have not an abundance of this world's goods, and did I not believe the Unseen One increases our money in answer to prayer I should wonder where it came from, for I put just as much, if not more, into my missionary box, my church, and all other benevolences as I did before I commenced sending money to our Temple. I believe our dear Saviour is just as ready to answer our prayers if we but fill the conditions, as when He was upon the earth. What right have we to expect to have our prayers answered or receive the blessing, if we are not in the condition to receive it? Please send the souvenir spoon. I expect to have a niece married soon. The spoon will make such a beautiful wedding gift; I will continue to use the old mite-box another year." How beautiful it is to see those on the confines of the other world with a heart full of sympathy to help and aid the woes of this. A little letter lies before me written by Mrs. A. G. Monson, Charlotte, Mich. The handwriting is cramped and the lines are very crooked, but it is full of interest and pathos. It is as follows: "Some weeks ago I sent the contents of a mite-box and received the beautiful spoon. We have admired it so much. My daughter wants one and we have filled the old mite-box to overflowing. I now send $6.70, wish it was more. Please excuse the crooked lines. I cannot see the writing on the paper, weak eyes and eighty-seven years is the cause. I have felt a deep interest in the Temple since it was first commenced, but can do but little to help the great cause."

Little Sophia, Gertrude and Bernice Ozenne and Homer Jolley, Morgan City, La., each had a Temple mite-box. In order to get money to fill them these four children gave a little concert, and from the receipts send $14.60. Four of our lovely souvenir spoons have been sent to these little workers in the sunny South to reward them for their labor of love.

The offer of the Columbian Publishing company to send the Educational Checker game, the game of Pixies and the Temple edition of the Ladies' Household Repository, for one dollar to unions or persons who secure a hundred orders, (allowing them twenty per cent for their work) has not met with the warm response we had expected. The above is one of the most generous offers we have ever known. The articles offered make useful and beautiful Christmas gifts,—paying the person handsomely who sells them—and beside turns into the Temple treasury a goodly sum.

A great many have sent a dollar to secure the three above articles. It would be impossible to sell them at that price singly, it is only in orders of one hundred that they can be offered at that rate. We will, however, send them for $1.25 postage prepaid, or we will send the Ladies' Repository and one of the games free of postage for $1. If intended for Christmas gifts orders should be sent for them without delay to Miss Sara G. Johnson, Room 1113 the Temple, Chicago.

The members of the Central W. C. T. U., of New Orleans, La., are to be congratulated that they have finished the payment on their hundred dollar pledge. Their faithful superintendent of Temple work, Mrs. S. S. Shove, has just sent the last installment of $30. A unique name is to be engraved on the Rhode Island tablet in Willard corridor, "The Providence Fire Department." The brave firemen of Providence have, through the faithful solicitations of Mrs. A. J. Winship, of Providence, R. I., completed their gift of one hundred dollars to the Temple, Mrs. Winship having sent the last payment of $35.

The Richmond and Hopkinton W. C. T. U., R. I., sends through its able and indefatigable superintendent of Temple work, Mrs. Mattie A. L. Greene, Hope Valley, R. I., $66. which completes the union's pledge. Mrs. Greene writes, "I can assure you I feel like grasping every one's hand who aided in the work. We had a fair and festival. The good people came to our rescue and gave us such a lift we can easily pay the $66 which completes our hundred dollars besides leaving a mite in our treasury. I long for the time when the good news will be spread that the beautiful Temple has become the property of the white-ribboners throughout the world."

Let our friends who are filling mite-boxes, remember if they desire to secure the silver souvenir tea-spoon for Christmas they must send $3.65 to us at once.

All persons sending $1 to the Temple will receive the beautiful Columbian souvenir. Any individual who sends the contents of a mite-box, amounting to $3.65, by January 1, 1895, will receive a solid silver Temple souvenir tea-spoon. This, however, does not apply to persons filling boxes for unions; they receive the Columbian souvenir. All money orders and checks should be made out in the name of William D. Preston, and sent to our financial secretary, Miss Sara G. Johnson, the Temple, Chicago, Ill. All other matters pertaining to the Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, the Temple, Chicago.

JUDGE NOT.

How do we know what hearts have vilest sin?
How do we know?
Many, like sepulchres are foul within,
Whose outward garb is spotless as the snow,
And many may be pure we think not so.
How near to God the souls of such have been,
What mercy secret penitence may win,—
How do we know?

How can we tell who sinned more than we?
How can we tell?
We think our brother walked guiltily,
Judging him in self-righteousness. Ah, well!
Perhaps had we been driven through the hell
Of his untold temptations, we might be Less upright in our daily walk than he,—
How can we tell?

Dare we condemn the ills that others do?
Dare we condemn?
Their strength is small, their trials not a few,
The tide of wrong is difficult to stem.
And if to us more clearly than to them
Is given knowledge of the good or true,
More do they need our help and pity too,—
Dare we condemn?

God help us all and lead us day by day,
God help us all.
We cannot walk alone the perfect way,
Evil allures us, tempts us and we fall;
We are but human and our power is small;
Not one of us may boast, and not a day
Rolls o'er our heads but each hath need to say,
God bless us all!

THE WHITE RIBBON.

BY MRS. FRANCES SEABURY.

"Excuse me, madam, but seeing that bit of ribbon made me bold to speak to you; they told me down at the W. C. T. U. hall that I could always speak to a lady if she wore that ribbon, and I've been watching for one. Yours is the first I've seen on the street since. My wife is ill, and has been in bed for a week and no one but the little one to wait on her—she is such a little mite—and I've just got work since I stopped drinking. We were so poor before that time, that it takes all I earn to get food and fuel, so there is nothing left to hire any one to care for my wife."

"I am very glad you spoke to me. Where do you live? I will go and see your wife."

"It is not a fine place, but we'll move by and by; number seventy, A —— street."

"And your name?"

"Thomas Searles. Go up three flights of stairs and knock at the door at the right hand; just knock softly, please, because if she should be asleep, it unsettles her nerves to be wakened suddenly."

"I'll be quiet and gentle. My name? Mrs. Grimes."

So our white-ribboner climbed the stairs and rapped gently at the door, which was opened by the "little one," who was only four years old. There lay the sick mother, with a wan countenance and anxious eyes that followed every movement the little girl made until she sat by her mother's side again, holding the thin hand and patting it with her tiny one.

Mrs. Grimes told Mrs. Searles how she found her out, and then with much tact questioned her as to her needs.

Between tears and smiles Mrs. Searles told how her husband had fallen from abundance to poverty and of his late conversion by means of the W. C. T. U.

When the husband came home at night he found the rooms transformed. There was a look of relief on the countenance of his wife, and the "little one" was playing with a new doll. He felt the sting of being an "object of charity," but was thankful to get help until he could help himself. He said to his wife, "I am so glad that I spied that bit of white ribbon and knew what it meant."

"I am very glad, too," said Mrs. Searles, "for Mrs. Grimes has helped me so much every way, and she said as soon as I was well the ladies would give me work, and then we'll move out of this place."

"That we will," said Mr. Searles. "I wonder," he continued, "why all the members of the W. C. T. U. do not wear the white ribbon; there are many who do not."

"I do not know. Perhaps some do not wish to be conspicuous as temperance women, but I am sure they would do much good if they did. If Mrs. Grimes knows how much peace and comfort she has brought to three persons through wearing the ribbon she will urge each member of her union to wear it always."

Life looked much brighter since these two knew some one was thinking of them and was willing to help them until they could help themselves. Mrs. Grimes' presence in the miserable rooms was like the first beautiful day after a long, dreary and cloudy winter. Her smile reminded the inmates of the warmth of the spring sunshine.

"You saw a white-ribboner going to the temperance hall," said Mrs. Searles, "and you went in too, and the songs and prayers touched your heart and you gave it to God. When we needed help it was the wearer of a white ribbon who brought it to us. If I had a voice to be heard all through the land I would use it to ask the temperance women to always wear their badge."

COMPETITION.

BY KIT CLOVER.

In our warfare against intoxicants, have we tried every means within our reach to win people away from the saloon? We can not drive them, not even for their own good. This has been fully demonstrated in the last ten years in Iowa, under the prohibition law. Those who did not use intoxicants favored the law, voted for it, and lived up to it. Many of those who wanted intoxicants would have them and do have them, law or no law.

There may or may not be much hope for the one who has already formed the drink habit, but there is a great fringe, as one might call it, the borderland of the drinkers, composed of those who sometimes take a drink, those who drink a glass of beer because of an "aching void," not caring for intoxicants if they could have something else as well.

I have learned of this need myself, by my own faintness. After a hard day's work, a wearisome journey, or a long, cold walk, when the vital powers have been so taxed that they have shown signs of flagging, then I felt the need of something warming and stimulating. Many a night worker stops on his way home for a drink of beer, or whisky, not because he particularly cares for that especial drink, but because he wants something, and that is easily available.

In many instances the drink habit is developed in this way. Now it may be that the soup kitchen idea has been tried thoroughly and wisely, and found to be a failure, but since I have never looked the matter up and do not know that it has, I would like to try it. I would like to open one central kitchen where all the soup could be made. In fact I would like to make it myself and see that every scrap that went into it was just as sweet and clean as possible. I would buy beans for bean soup by the barrel, and barley by the car load. I would secure all the clippings and bones from the butchers, stipulating that it be kept scrupulously clean for this very purpose, instead of being thrown under the cutting table. I would purchase stale bread,—no, I don't like the word "stale"—but dry bread that is not salable, but yet good and sweet. I would give a good big bowl of hot soup and a generous slice of bread for five cents, or one such bowl and a ticket for a second bowl for five cents.

I would not call it a charity, and I would have the room light and warm. There should be flowers in the windows, and pictures on the walls, and some daily papers free to all patrons.

I would have numbers of other such kitchens with the soup being carried to these branches in cans, and there heated over gas or electric heaters.

Every kitchen should be called the—well, since it is to be my enterprise I will name it "The Clover Kitchen," and the name shall stand for a trademark of respectability and good hot soup at low prices, just as every one knows, when they see the trademark of a certain bakery that they can find good food therein.

I am waiting now for my "ship" to come in with the money to start operations. Then my kitchens will all be self-supporting once the people come to know how much more real good there is in a bowl of soup and bread than in a mug of beer.

MOTHER VS. CITIZEN.

Mary S. Gilliland, in a late number of The International Journal of Ethics, voices her conviction on one phase of "the woman question" in the following frank fashion, containing a truth that the coming generations will surely have to meet squarely:

"To-day a married woman has frequently the utmost difficulty in keeping in touch, even remotely, with current events and current thought. To take an active part in the making of those events and shaping of those thoughts is impossible to her. During so many, sometimes, as twenty of the best years of her life, she is absorbed totally by the minutiæ of family life. Many children exhaust her physically, mentally and morally. She is the most overworked and most hopelessly exploited of all our social slaves. The marvelous and inexhaustible passion of motherhood has sustained her. But even this tenderest loveliness of nature has, by over stimulation, turned into a curse. It has prevented such women perceiving the true aspect of their condition, and it has tended to degrade motherhood itself. It has become too often a physical passion over the latest baby rather than a rational sympathy with and for the growing children. The tenderness and insight that can mother the growing spirits of her children is a nobler and more human thing, in a woman, than the trembling rapture with which she clasps the baby at her breast. We need both. The finer the woman the more she will be capable of both. But if motherhood is to grow adequate to growing humanity, the former must preponderate in life over the latter. We shall do a service then, to women, a service to motherhood, a service to family life and a service to the community, if we protest against the cruel absorption of so long a period of a woman's life and so large a portion of her strength in child-bearing.

"Everybody knows that the excess which we permit in this matter is not merely prohibitive of the public work of the women in question, but is injurious in every way to family life. The woman is often incapable of that everyday duty of upper servant of the household which our present wasteful and individualistic domestic economy lays upon her, even in well-to-do middle-class homes. She cannot, by reason of her physical exhaustion, drag herself about to 'see to things.' Which of us has not seen bright, clever girls turned, in a few years, into irritable, dull women, who can talk of nothing but their own and their children's illness, or the delinquencies of their servants? What chance has such a victim of growing to be a 'whole-human'? What chance have her children of rational sympathy and intelligent care? What chance has her husband of thinking of her with respect as his equal and companion?

"We are so afraid to trust humanity that we have a superstitious dread of making any alterations in what we rightly feel to be a most fundamental relation. We are so dull with custom, so cowardly in face of convention, so unloving as men and women and parents and children, that we cannot think boldly and confer freely in the hope of bettering things. Each one thinks too exclusively of his or her own side of the question. We are so stupid and ignorant that we do not see that in an organic group the good of each is necessarily the good of all. So we go on. Chaos spreads, superstition deepens, and a kind of numbing despair is seizing on all those who care greatly but cannot see clearly. Do let us try to understand one another. Especially let the young grown-up men and women of to-day try to see each other's points of view. Do let us put away that false shame, which is a thing to be ashamed of, which prevents people discussing openly and gravely this most grave difficulty."

EVOLUTION OF A SUFFRAGIST.

BY MRS. ADELAIDE SIMMONS.

Experience and observation indicate that the usual evolution of a desire to vote and an earnest effort toward the fulfillment of the wish is as follows:

First, a woman or girl becomes interested in the poor and oppressed in her own town and the great cities, also in isolated cases in the rural districts.

The natural impulse of the womanly heart is to alleviate suffering, to feed the hungry, clothe and warm the chilled and feeble, and this work comes next, quickly followed or even accompanied by an earnest inquiry into the cause of these troubles and a desire to prevent their recurrence.

Almost invariably the drink habit is found to be the cause of want, misery and disease, and the gentle soul grieved and roused by the ruin wrought, becomes fully enlisted in the temperance work.

Next, when she finds with what fettered hands women must fight King Alcohol and other oppressors, she longs for the ballot, to help secure wise and moral rulers who will make and enforce laws for the protection of the innocent sufferers, and to protect the sinners against their own diseased appetites.

Is it possible for a woman to be "too gentle and feminine" to pass through this evolution?

If such an evolution is "impossible" to a woman, a description other than gentle and feminine would better suit the case.

A CAREFUL record kept at Yale for eight years shows that non-smokers are twenty per cent taller, twenty-five per cent heavier, and have sixty per cent more lung capacity than smokers. A recent graduating class at Amherst presented a similar difference in favor of non-smokers, who had gained in weight twenty-four per cent over the smokers, and in height thirty-seven per cent, and also exceeded them in lung capacity.—Exchange.

LILLO.

BY VELMA V. BEEBE.

"Well, I'll take your fiddle at that price; but it's too much. You've talked with too many Yankees, Karl."

"Ah, no, no! You know not my feedle, you calls him. I not part mit him only for Lillo. I have no bread, no clodings for Lillo, only."

"Lillo, who's he? Not your brother, surely. That's no German name."

"Oh, he leetle monkey boys mit organs. He fery seek. Man lefted him. I peek him oop. See?"

"So you think more of Lillo than of your fiddle? You told me once you loved the fiddle best of anything in the world. Remember that?"

"No, no, no, no, I tell you true. De feedle, he my liebe; but Lillo, he got nobody. I moos not leave him hoongry gehen. Dese feedle, he be joos same mit you; I no haf moneys, Lillo die. I tell you, but, Lillo, he mooch a-moosing, you calls him. Take you Lillo. I take feedles den. No care for moneys."

The German boy's face brightened as if a gleam of sunshine had broken through, as the possibility of doing his duty and gaining his own pleasure dawned upon him.

Fred laughed.

"How do you think I can take care of a sick boy, you young rascal? You're playing tricks on me. Besides, it was the violin I wanted. If I wanted to adopt a boy I'd go to an orphan asylum."

"Oh, he no seek now. I cure him. He joos a leetle, what you calls him, queer. You like him, I tink. He good boy. I go get him."

Off darted Karl leaving Fred half dazed. Had he agreed to adopt an unknown boy? He could not remember what he had said. Should he go away and disappoint Karl?

Before he could decide, Karl reappeared, leading what seemed to be a very small and feeble old man dressed in an odd assortment of garments. Fred gave one look and burst into a peal of laughter. It was a monkey. Of course. That was what Karl had said—"leetle monkey boys."

"See here!" said Fred, as the pair came up, "I haven't bargained for any monkey. I thought it was a boy you were to bring."

Fred's conscience smote him a little for the deception. He would have had to make some other excuse had Lillo really been a boy.

"Ah, take him," pleaded Karl. "He good boy, but he cold boy. I no can taken good care of him. You reech, you keep him warm, you give him good tings eat. I know he happy; I forget Lillo, play my feedle an' bees happy too."

Fred considered a moment. After all, why shouldn't he? A monkey is an amusing pet and he had always had a curiosity to know how far a monkey could be trained to act like a man.

"Well," he said slowly, "I guess—I might as well take him."

Karl was overjoyed. He clasped Lillo affectionately in his arms just once and then ran swiftly around the corner. Soon the sound of a violin reached Fred's ears, growing fainter and then mingling with and losing itself in the street clamor.

Lillo stood watching his new master with a disapproving face. Then he snarled like a dog and chattered in an angry tone, but seemed to have no thought of running away. When Fred started on, Lillo started too, sometimes on four legs, sometimes on two, with the peculiar dancing movement of all organ-monkeys.

"Hello, Fred!" came a boyish v ice across the street. "Going into the grind-organ business?"

"Guess I'll have to, Tom. Come over here and give me some good advice. That little German, Karl," he continued as his friend approached, "has inveigled me into taking this monkey to take care of. What shall I do, put him in an orphan asylum?"

"Oh, keep him by all means. We'll have no end of fun with him down at the 'Cad.' I've seen the little fellow before. He's a regular crank, and Karl's as gentle and patient with him as a mother with a six weeks' baby. Come on. Let's hunt up some of the other fellows and introduce our young friend."

The academy was to reopen in less than a week and they had little trouble in finding a dozen young fellows with nothing in particular to do. With much shouting and laughter they escorted Lillo to the confectioner's where they won his good will with cakes and sweetmeats for which he begged with winning gestures and pleading cries.

This amusement grew stale after a time and one of the rougher ones proposed taking Lillo to a beer saloon and getting him drunk. The proposition was greeted with a shout by most of the boys, who, to tell the truth, would have thought little of going there and getting drunk themselves.

Fred, however, was different. He had been brought up to think of the wickedness of drinking much as he would of stealing; but a monkey—that seemed different. Yes, he would go.

He walked slowly along in the rear of the group, reaching the saloon just in time to see Lillo taking his first glass. How eagerly he grasped it! Evidently it was no new thing to him. Then he begged for more and more. Fred turned away disgusted.

Suddenly a shriek rang through the room. There was a rush for the door, and Fred saw in the midst of the turmoil a boy struggling with the maddened monkey. It was Tom. The monkey's teeth were sunk into his arm, and in spite of cruel blows and kicks the hold would not loosen.

"Kill the beast!" shouted some one.

"He no de ones," cried a clear voice. "You all bess be killed," and Karl strode into the room.

"Hello, Dutchy!" shouted the bar-keeper, who, safe out of harm's way, seemed rather to be enjoying the scene than otherwise. "You better have some beer. You know you drink it."

Karl's blue eyes flashed fire.

"No, no, never! My vater, he tell me better an' my Lillo, too. Ah, I know de poison. Lillo, Lillo, I feared me o' dis!"

He clasped the enraged beast, and spoke gently in his own loved language. Lillo seemed to understand. He loosed his hold on Tom, and crept submissively away by Karl's side.

SKATES AND SKATING.

In whatever light you look at skating it is a splendid sport, says American Young People. It is one of the most healthful of exercises; it tends to develop cheery, hearty, wholesome boys and girls, and men and women. All up through the centuries the style of skates has kept improving, until at the present time there seems to be little room left for improvement, either for the racing or the pleasure skates. Whether it be on the famous fens of England; on the ice commons, or the canals, or the far-famed Zuyder Zee of Holland; on the rivers of Norway or Russia; on the lakes, and ponds, and rivers of our own noble America —wherever you shall travel in all the years of your life, take along your skates; you will find use for them on both sides of the sea, and wherever you go you shall find foemen worthy of your steel.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—The big Convention number last week crowded out our children's page and so I expect there were some disappointed Cornerers. However, it does us good to be deprived of our usual enjoyments once in awhile, for we appreciate them so much the more afterward. Isn't that true?

I had thought to have our "Convention Number" of Cozy Corner this week and to tell you about some of the interesting things that happened there,—it was such a glorious Convention! But, lo, a Cleveland Cornerer has sent such a good letter about the great event that I am going to let him tell the whole story and give his account entire:

DEAR COZY CORNER COUSINS:—As many of you know the great National Convention met at Cleveland last month. I met our dear Aunt Jane at the Convention and she asked me to write a letter to the Cozy Corner cousins and tell you about the Convention.

The W. C. T. U. held its first convention in Cleveland twenty-one years ago and has not held a convention in Cleveland since that time. When men get to be twenty-one years old they are old enough to vote; that's what most of the women talked about at the Convention, for they want to have the right to vote.

On Friday night the L. T. L. of Cleveland marched and sang on the platform of the Convention; there were several companies. Each company carried its own banner, and they were led in their exercises by Mrs. Rice, the National superintendent of the L. T. L.

Some of the women who attended the Convention and spoke were Mother Thompson, Mother Stewart, Miss Willard, Mrs. Barnes, some Y girls from South Africa, Miss F. H. Ensign. There are a great many ladies but I have not time to write about them all.

On Y night the Y organizers filled Miss Willard's lap with flowers. One of the speakers on Y night was Mr. Baer, secretary of the Christian Endeavor societies.

The Y's are going to put Aunt Jane's name on a tablet in the Temple.

I am sorry I cannot tell all about the Convention, there were so many things done and said, but I can't tell very much about it in a letter. But I must tell about Mrs. Harris, of Boston, how lovely she sang. She could sing away up high and hold on the note so that it would sound like a bird singing up in the air.

And there was a little woman from Japan; her name was Madame Chika Sakurai. She could be understood, and could speak plain English and she had a lot of Japanese things to sell to help her with her work. She is trying to raise money for a school in Japan for the women in Japan so that they may be educated and learn about Jesus.

I have a little temperance baby brother and my papa is a Prohibitionist and my mamma is a white-ribboner, and I belong to the L. T. L. Your temperance cousin,

Cleveland, O. HARRY HILL.

I hardly know which I enjoyed most in the varied exercises and events of the Convention. But I do know that Cozy Cornerers would all like to have joined with a clap of the hands and a stamp of the foot in that L. T. L. yell by the children on welcome night; P-r-o pro, h-i hi, prohi, b-i bi, prohibi, t-i-o-n tion, PROHIBITION! SALOONS MUST GO!! Of course everybody clapped and so did

I thought perhaps I could join your Cozy Corner. My mamma takes THE UNION SIGNAL and I love to read it. We make out all the Soft Shelled Nuts. I live in the country and go to school every day. I have never seen any letters from Maryland. I would like to see my name in the nieces' column and I will close now with love to all the nieces and nephews. Your would-be niece, ALICE V. VANDEGRIFT.

Elkton, Md.

You are one of us, Alice.

I am a little girl six years old. My Aunt Kate made me a white ribbon baby before I was a year old, and mamma lets me wear the badge when I ride on the cars. I signed the triple pledge and sent a card to the World's Fair, and mamma saw the red, white and blue cards in the Woman's Building. We live in West Troy, N. Y. Papa preaches in the Presbyterian church. We have come to grandma's for our vacation. I can't write yet, so I have auntie write for me and I tell her what to say. I'm always going to work for temperance.

Your little niece,

Whitelaw, N. Y. GRACE B. VAN AUKEN.

Give the Cozy Corner salute, boys and girls, to the girl who's "always going to work for temperance."

THE VOICE OF SCIENCE.

The lecture of Dr. Justus Gaule, of Zurich University, to which Prof. Ellen Hayes' letter (found on page 4 of this issue) calls our attention, is one of a series given in Berne for the advancement of temperance in Switzerland. The Doctor deals with alcohol not from the standpoint of its dangerous qualities, now universally admitted by its friends and foes alike, but from the standpoint of its claims as a pleasure-giver.

The praises of the "flowing bowl" have been so often chanted in song and told in story, and the happiness and good cheer to be found in the wine cup continues to be so alluringly pictured by the devotees of pleasure, that the voice of science concerning this phase of the character of alcohol is a most timely contribution to reform effort all along the line, and will be welcomed by temperance workers everywhere. Dr. Gaule's presentation of the subject is especially commended to the moderate drinker who is "tired of the threadbare arguments of the Prohibitionists."

The fact, he says, that so many men "seek this condition (i. e., the condition resulting from the use of alcohol) even passionately seek and value and prefer it to others, must have deep psychological ground," and his analysis of the "ground" unfolds the why and the how of that increased feeling of happiness or exhilaration which characterizes the first stages of intoxication. To understand the influence of alcohol on the nerve centers it is necessary, says the doctor, to understand the relation between the impression of an idea and its expression, but in these days every school-boy in the higher grades knows something of brain action and reflex action and their relation to each other.

The effect of even small doses of alcohol, we are told by the eminent physicist, is to increase the rapidity of reflex action in such a way as to entirely exclude brain action, which is always slower. The brain is thus isolated from other centers—plays no part in the expression of ideas which are conveyed to the mind through the senses. It is "exactly as if the brain were cut away . . . . the man no longer stops to consider the whole situation, to make use of impressions of former experiences stored away in his brain, or weigh present obligations . . . alcohol dethrones reason and loosens the tongue."

In the light of these teachings of science, is it not clearly seen that the problems which beset us, problems which government must deal with, would be more readily solved if the men who wrestled with them possessed brains whose legitimate functions were undisturbed by the use of alcohol. Have we not a right to demand that our rulers, our lawmakers—that every man who helps to govern this country by casting a vote—should be in a condition physically and mentally to "consider the whole situation" and to "weigh present obligations"? And the dictum of science is that no man can keep himself in such condition unless he be a total abstainer from all alcoholic drinks.

If this is the influence of alcohol, where, then, is the pleasure? Happiness, says the Zurich professor, consists in a proper balance between us and our environment. If we feel superior to outside forces we are happy; if outside forces seem to prevail against us we feel unhappy and discouraged. In order then to secure happiness we must gain control of powers outside which seem to oppose us. We are struck here very forcibly with the harmony between the law of science as revealed by the distinguished physiologist and the divine command as revealed in the Mosaic record of creation. "Subdue the earth"—"have dominion over all things" is the word of God to man.

Now in what way does alcohol help man to rise superior to his environment? Clearly, as the lecturer points out, it does not act upon outside influences, and, as we have seen, it as clearly does not increase our own power to overcome. What does it do then? "It deceives us," declares Dr. Gaule; "it dulls our appreciation of powers outside of us until they seem so much smaller that we are sure we can conquer them, and so gain a feeling of satisfaction." The brain—the reason—no longer sits in judgment, and all things become distorted to the mental vision of the moderate drinker—as material surroundings become distorted to the physical vision of the excessive drinker. And so again we find the word of God in Scripture and the word of God in science in perfect accord. Both declare wine to be a "mocker."

Nine-tenths of all drinkers, says Dr. Gaule, seek in the use of alcohol the feeling of happiness. "We must have, now and then, a care-free hour," they say. But if they knew themselves and knew alcohol better, how many would of their own free will elect to be "deceived thereby"? How many would continue to think that "policy" or "personal liberty" demands the protection of the drink traffic? There might be a few so lost to a sense of manliness as to be willing to sink periodically into a state of idiotic forgetfulness and false security; some, no doubt, who, actuated by the love of money—that root of all evil, would willingly see men—a whole nation, if possible—deceived by strong drink, but we believe that a wider knowledge of the psycho-physiological effects of alcohol would tend to add largely to the ranks of total abstainers and political Prohibitionists.

The voice of science will no doubt speak louder and louder upon this question as time goes on, until the people take hold upon the truth, as stated by Dr. Gaule, that "alcohol holds men to a plane of rudeness in which they deaden and make useless the most precious instrument which is given them for their development."

DEVELOPMENT OF SUFFRAGE.

Little by little, now with discouraging delays, again with more brightening outlook, the wall of custom and prejudice that has shut woman away from her rights of suffrage, is being broken down. A world-wide view of the situation reveals the fact that women possess suffrage in some form in nearly every country—France, Sweden, Norway, Ireland, Russia, Finland, Austria-Hungary, Crotia, Dalmatia, Italy, the Madras and Bombay Presidencies, the Russian Colonies of Russian Asia, in Cape Colony, New Zealand, Iceland, the Isle of Man, Pitcairn Island and the Dominion of Canada. In twenty-one of our states women have the right of school suffrage in greater or less degree, and the war is hopefully "on" from Atlantic to Pacific.

As it has in temperance agitation long since become needless to dwell upon the somber pictures of the woe that follows in the wake of the liquor demon, it is also, in discussions touching woman's enfranchisement, becoming less and less needful to dwell upon the wrong of woman's "slavery" and the blessing of woman's "rights." The question is not, do we need and shall we have Prohibition and suffrage, but, instead, there is ringing out in ever increasing volume the never-to-be retracted proclamation, "It is coming!" The problem has been reduced to the simple queries of how and when.

The battering rams of arrested thought (arrested but to sweep mightily forward in the new and best way) growing public sentiment and universal education, are in themselves earnests of the promise that the walls of our prison shall soon fall. The blows are directed thick and fast from within, and, God be thanked, from without. Within, it is woman's own hand that directs the charge and her muscle is developing magnificently under the new system of gymnastics. Without the walls are her father and brother, her husband and her son. But there is civil war, also within and without, woman against woman (for some of us are blind as yet, and fancy the wall that shuts us away from partaking in life's administrative business, means but safety and ease and comfort), and men against us and the brothers who are on our side.

We spend many words in blaming the enfranchised sex for our bonds. May it not be that we have in bygone centuries helped to build this wall of restraint ourselves?

National ills are always the outgrowth of broken law, not human necessarily, but divine. Had the Americans as a race acknowledged the command of Christ, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," and applied it in its deepest and broadest spiritual sense, there would have been no war to fight and no slaves to free. Whenever individuals have followed Bible standards as a unity there have been found men and women who have led or followed the most advanced reforms. The Bible in human action means liberty—"ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free," the freed hands moving at once to strike chains off other wrists. May it not be that woman has in the past aided and abetted in her own oppression, by blinding her eyes to the breadth of the privileges and duties which were hers and by closing her ears to calls both human and divine, the answering of which might have made and kept her free?

The Crusaders of twenty years ago took to their hearts the spirit of the command, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature," translating "gospel" to mean whatsoever things are honest, just, pure, lovely, of good report. To-day five hundred thousand white-ribboners "all round the world" proclaim the gospel of liberty from appetite, from ignorance, from pernicious and enslaving custom, themselves living a gospel of health, knowledge, common sense and the higher liberties which are the outgrowth of true restraint.

In this suffrage contest, only as woman comes to understand and live the gospel which never taught that any "middle wall of partition" should stand between the sexes in the administrations of life, so only shall the wall be borne down, and being borne down, the liberated shall go forth to preach and sit in the council of the preachers, teach and elect the teachers for her little ones, join hands for the just and pure government of her native land, one with her brother man wherever God is worshipped in spirit and in truth.

ARBITRATION A PUBLIC SAFEGUARD.

More than once it has been proved that the laborer is more willing than the capitalist to submit their differences to arbitration. In the face of the fact that the railroad strike of last summer paralyzed for weeks the entire business interests of the nation, the capitalist insisted that the difficulty was strictly his own affair with which the public had no right to interfere, and that he "had nothing to arbitrate." What might the country not have been saved had there been some power by which the one party could have been allowed, and the other obliged, to make a plain statement before a court of arbitration? Even though each was at liberty to disregard the decision of the court, the moral influence of that decision must have been very strong. The willingness of the laborer as contrasted with the unwillingness of the capitalist to submit to arbitration, argues well for the righteousness of the former's cause.

It is clear, however, that arbitration almost necessarily involves the recognition of the right of labor to organize and to act in its organic capacity, and would for that very reason be likely to be opposed by capital. This incidental result will, by the vast majority of people, be hailed as in itself just and right. On the other hand, the establishment of courts of arbitration with the limited compulsion recommended by the Commission of Labor would be a safeguard to capital and the public generally against the acts of violence which almost invariably accompany a prolonged strike. While labor organizations seem to have been cleared of complicity in the destruction of property and life which occurred last summer, there have been very many instances in which striking workmen have resorted to violence to prevent other workmen taking their places, and, under present conditions, they must be under the strongest temptation to resort to such methods. This temptation would be almost wholly removed if the laborers knew that they could get their case fairly before the people instead of having to trust to the reports of a press more concerned about the spiciness than the accuracy of its news, and too often manipulated in the interest of their foes.

The average American citizen is willing to bide patiently the decision of his peers—the verdict of public sentiment—if only he is given the opportunity to present his case fairly. He knows, moreover, that when he appears before this tribunal acts of violence on his part will seriously injure his cause. The conviction that all of the forces of society are enlisted on the side of his oppressor, and that he cannot even get a hearing is driving the laborer to desperation. Arbitration then is the next step to be taken. The goal to be sought is the emancipation of the laborer and the equitable distribution of wealth and labor. Arbitration may do little more than smooth the pathway thither; but unless that pathway is smoothed we are destined to experience social convulsions more terrific than any of the past. If capital and labor are to be left as heretofore to fight out their differences, he must be a "calamity howler," indeed, who shall paint in too dark colors the evils before us.

DAME NATURE'S LAW.

We may overreach one another, but Dame Nature can by no means be overreached. She has written a law in our members which says that the equilibrium between brain and hand work must be maintained or the individual must suffer. If he is wholly occupied with hand work his brain is dwarfed; if he is wholly occupied with brain work his hand is dwarfed; the sluiceways of his blood are atrophied and insomnia bears him onward in its phantom chariot away from the pleasant Land of Nod into the pitiless Sahara of nervous prostration.

If he would occupy his physical energies for two or three hours daily in some useful reaction on the forces about him, his thought would be far more electric, his sympathies warmer, his happiness incalculably increased. On the other hand, the unduly heavy task of his brother, the hand-worker, diminished by the blithe activity of the brain worker would leave leisure to the laborer for mental discipline, so that both would be far finer men, better comrades, and the labor question would have solved itself to the incalculable advantage of him who is now brain worker and by that fact a fractional man, and of him who is now hand worker and by that fact a fractional man. But these reasonable views of life are coming to be held by most of us in these last languid days as theories at least, and we have a right to hope that the next generation will hold them as everyday methods of common sense behavior.

But we do wrong when we live beneath our privilege, and, knowing that we ought to exercise each day, we sin when we yield to the constantly deepening habit of the sedentary life. If we sin knowingly in this particular, it is easier for us to break the laws of God in any and every other detail of our lives.

There is a sacredness in useful exercise, not only in the results it yields, but in its effect on character that can never come from the selfish forms of exercise in which we engage, saying within ourselves, "I am doing this for my health." We should therefore counsel a moderate amount of housework, gardening, farming, poultry culture and other light employments with a useful end. For humanity is in this world to make the world more like a home to all who dwell here, and we can soon tell whether we are living for that object or for some other. No one need be self-deceived, or if he is, he may be sure that those about him are not deceived as to the nucleus around which he has formed his life and character.

A LETTER received recently by Miss Willard from Brigadier Fielding of the Salvation Army, expresses for himself and Commander Booth regret at the untoward circumstances that prevented the representation of the Salvation Army at her welcome home in Chicago. The Brigadier says, "As an organization we are with you and the temperance movement heart and soul, and we are grateful to God for His having brought you back home safely, and we pray that the mighty influence for truth, temperance and righteousness which you have shed around you in the past years of your life may be increased during your future years, be they few or many."

IN introducing Colonel Bain recently in Music Hall, Boston, Miss Willard said, "The saloon-keeper has not on the face of the earth a more genial, lovable, implacable foe than Col. George Washington Bain, of Kentucky. His motto, like his character, has always said, 'I do not question the motives of men; I try to argue the merits of the case.' His boyhood illustrated the difference between good and goody-goody. Vigorous and manly, a stalwart for the right, the little fellow was wont to walk from the country home, where Christian parents nurtured him in the love of God and humanity, a round distance of twelve miles to attend the regular monthly meeting of the temperance society. He is a knight of the new chivalry, not a carpet knight of meaningless conventionalities. He might not 'crook the pregnant hinges of the knee that thrift might follow fawning' as he picked up a lady's handkerchief, but for twenty years he has bent himself sturdily to the task of picking up and placing in her hand a pure white ballot. Every utterance of his comes from lips that have never once profaned the name of God or spoken lightly of a woman. If all men lived as he has always lived each home in the nation would illustrate our white ribbon creed of a white life for two. He is a foregleam of the future, a prophecy of what shall be, and as a woman I bring my tribute to him here and now and thank him from a grateful heart in the name of good women everywhere throughout the land he loves."

THE first special report issued by the factory inspectors of Illinois, is upon the hand-to-hand conflict the inspectors have had with the small-pox scourge in the sweatshops of Chicago. The pamphlet is a sad testimonial to the criminal negligence of manufacturers and even of civic authorities in aiding the state inspectors in their duty of enforcing law. The honey-combing of great cities by tenement-houses is an almost insurmountable barrier in the way of any effective stamping out of the dread plague. Ignorance and fear on the part of the tenement inhabitants who work for factories are supplemented by the greed of landlords who are afraid that the yellow card on their premises will ruin for a long time their chances of renting, and cases of the disease are hidden away by every possible subterfuge, the yellow card being tacked upon rear sheds, in hallways, upon inside doors, up three flights of stairs, or not at all. The city board of health has even so far incriminated itself as to have adopted an avowed policy of concealment, and lists have been rendered by manipulation absolutely worthless. Even pest-house returns were made unreliable. These revelations ought to stir up not only righteous indignation but arouse to an increased watchfulness and activity every man and woman who personally or through the medium of an organization can aid in correcting this state of affairs which, it is very probable, is common to many cities besides the one in question.

THE enemies of the temperance reform are ever on the alert, and are to be outwitted by an alertness on the part of reformers not only equal to but in advance of them. This has recently been illustrated by the experience of a prohibition settlement in Melbourne, Australia. Every safeguard possible hedged the way about, but, notwithstanding, "the most shameful violations of the legal enactment by sly grog-selling have constantly occurred." The liquor party grew bold, and at their instance a poll was taken to determine the advisability of establishing a distillery for the manufacture of brandy. The arguments were subtle—subtlety is a prominent characteristic of the liquor fiend—and the statement is made that many teetotalers were won over, and the result was three hundred and eighty-nine votes cast in favor of the distillery and eighty-nine against. Meantime the temperance party, as a party, was quiescent, until the opponents grew bold enough to petition parliament for an alteration of the law, granting them licenses. A counter petition to keep and enforce the better law was then prepared, and Mr. Tennyson Smith, a prominent and skilled worker and lecturer, engaged to head the forces for right. So the war goes on around the world. God speed the victory!

THE statement that Lady Henry Somerset is in any wise engaged in a crusade concerning living pictures in New York or elsewhere, must be the outcome of a desire on the part of those who are proprietors of theatrical exhibitions of a doubtful character to introduce an element of national jealousy into the discussion. Lady Henry Somerset is quietly at work, as usual, with stenographers, attending to her enormous correspondence and writing articles and paragraphs for her paper, the Woman's Signal, and other London publications. She now and then attends a lecture or gives a temperance or suffrage address. On December 5, she spoke at a no-license rally in Cambridge, and on December 9 she spoke in the church of Rev. Dr. A. J. Gordon at the anniversary of the Boston W. C. T. U.

Dr. Justin Winsor, the well-known librarian of Harvard College, introduced women into his class-room last year. This was the first time that they had entered as listeners into a Harvard professor's college lecture room, but following the lead of such a leader women are this year admitted by several of the professors.

The advance in thought along sociological lines within the last fifteen years has been astonishingly rapid. From many different centers the leaven was quietly working, and many men and women had reached the view that something was the matter with our entire system when Bellamy's "Looking Backward" appeared and produced an effect such as has been produced by very few books of this or any other age. Some were converted completely to its doctrines, while many more for the first time perceived that other social systems than our own were possible and that our system needed much more radical treatment than they had supposed.

In Russia the mistress of the new ruler is a recognized official of the Court whose income is met from the revenues of the state, whose appearance at the theater is recognized by a rising audience, and whose photograph is displayed in the shop windows of St. Petersburg beside that of the Imperial family. If we wish to measure the moral distance between Russia and the United States, we have but to imagine this condition of things prevailing in the President's family or that of any member of the government. Purity has preëmpted for itself a wide domain in the thought and life of a people so free that its women go about in safety unattended by night and by day, and have open to them practically all avenues of honorable employment or achievement.

"So you want to buy some real estate?" I asked an acquaintance recently. "Yes," she answered. "I want to use my money. It lies there in the bank and I might have an income from rentals." She was well-housed, well-fed, elegantly clothed, aside from this money she wanted to "use." My morning lesson in the Word had been about the rich young man, whom Jesus beholding, loved. He said unto him, "One thing thou lackest; go thy way, sell whatsoever thou hast and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven." Ah, what a purchase of real estate that would have been—an heritage in that house not made with hands, eternal. Is there not a question here—how rich in earthly possessions dare a Christian become?

It is well known that A. Gilman, Esq., was the prime mover among men in the enterprise that has resulted in Radcliffe College for women, but it may not be so generally understood that Mr. Gilman frankly declares that his wife put the germ of this great educational movement into his mind and insisted upon his bringing it to the attention of the professors of Harvard College after he had made the plan. The first formal meeting for the organization of the "annex" was held January 14, 1879, and was called by Mr. and Mrs. Gilman. These facts ought to be known to women generally, and they cannot too highly honor Mr. A. Gilman, director of the Cambridge School for Girls, who has illustrated in his great work not the chivalry of conventionality, but that higher and more recent form—the chivalry of justice.

A friend has written On Duty a bit of personal "experience" which may be helpfully passed on. She says: "I was very busy about this and that, and my work called me much away from home, so much in fact, that many household tasks were left undone, among them window washing. But you see I had not paused to look out of the windows in weeks, and had truly forgotten or failed to observe that they were dirty. But a day of sickness came. I drew my lounge beside the window that I might watch the changes of the beautiful autumn sky. But I could not enjoy looking out—indeed, I could not well see out for dust and city grime. Ill as I was I had to get up and wash the panes, but not before Grace had read this lesson to my heart: In our multitude of worldly cares we often forget to care for the windows of the soul that look heavenward, but we seem to be well and not to need such communion with heaven. Trouble comes and as we are forced to turn our eyes outward and upward our vision is blurred—carelessness, selfishness, aye, perhaps outright sin have come between us and the Sun of Righteousness. When we are least able to do it we must remove the obstructions. It is best not to be too busy about the 'cares of this world.'"

ON DUTY.

NEWS FROM THE FIELD

KANSAS.

NEWS OF THE EQUAL SUFFRAGE CONTEST.

From a strictly non-partisan campaign standpoint, I think I can conscientiously say that it was a Republican defeat; for with their overwhelming majority they could easily have carried the amendment with no help from any other party had they so desired. And they can have no excuse, for with the system devised for keeping the tally of each party separately they would have gotten the credit of all the votes they cast and if they had carried it, how much we would have honored them, under the circumstances, and they would have well deserved our gratitude. But the count revealed a less per cent of favorable votes from the Republicans than from either of the others (of course excepting the Democrats). Somehow I fail to see just why we women, who have never, as yet, had any say in political matters, should have been used to vent the spite of a whole party upon. Summed up, it must stand about like this: "Anything to beat the other fellows," and in order to accomplish it the whisky vote must be secured, and to secure that vote the loyal and pure womanhood of the state must be sacrificed, as upon no other condition would that element give the party their votes; and now just how they can expect the women of Kansas to form political clubs or to work in any way for the success of those who have turned their backs upon us, is past my comprehension.

If we are "smitten on one cheek," should we "turn the other also"? To me it looks as though they did not want woman's assistance, and it surely ought to lead us all to see our duty of giving what "aid and comfort" we can to the only party that has ever stood firm and true for woman's enfranchisement, and which, though not victorious, largely increased its previous vote, and came out of the conflict with a clean record in its work for God, and home and humanity. Every vote cast for Major Pickering was a protest against evil, and an indorsement of the principle of prohibition, so dear to the heart of every white-ribboner.

There were some strange vagaries brought to light in my home county on election day. One man was so anxious to defeat the women that he voted nothing else upon his ticket. Several tickets were voted entire blanks. Surely women could have cast as intelligent ballots as those. One man voted for Major Pickering, and then for one candidate on another ticket (local), who was the hardest drinker in the town, these two extremes being all he cared to elect. The entire campaign of the Democratic party was waging warfare on equal suffrage and prohibition. They had no other object in view, and now glory in our defeat, lauding their own bravery in fighting and conquering the women. It must have required a large stock of "bravery" to wage warfare upon non-combatants, upon a perfectly defenceless class, and they may well feel proud (?) of their record.

We had so much faith in the "manhood of man" (especially of Kansas men) that our defeat comes all the more crushingly. The women of Kansas did nobly. Some mistakes may have been made, but were unforeseen, hence unavoidable. And now what next? Like Paul, "we are perplexed, but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed," for now begins a new campaign. We don't intend to give up the battle. The principle is right, and must prevail, and if we, who have been bearing the burdens of this campaign, do not live to see its successful workings in the future we will gladly leave it as a legacy to our daughters.

There is some talk of trying to get the coming session of the legislature to re-submit the question, but I doubt if it does so, each party being so embittered against the other. The antis say,—"give us a rest," but that was what they have always wanted. I would not leave this topic without extending our heartiest thanks to all those men who stood so nobly by us, not only with their counsel, but with their votes also. Each one deserves a tablet in our memories. We were under great obligations for the aid we received from suffragists of other states, both financially, and for the many able lectures delivered all over the state and we can only hope to repay the debt by helping others in like circumstances. The campaign was a wonderful educator, and developed our own women marvelously. Many who had never before heard their own voices in public address, have become eloquent platform speakers, so that, as regards woman's intellectual advancement, it was a grand success. Aside from the discouragement of past results, we are much better fitted to undertake the work for another two years, than we were the past two, and "the golden halo of light and glory" that our Democratic opponents are so fond of quoting, as "encircling woman's brow," must have been considerably "brightened up" in its luster during the recent suffrage campaign.

Not many of our Kansas women were privileged to attend the National Convention, but our hearts were there, and our prayers ascended daily for its success.

We were glad that our corresponding secretary was able to report a goodly number of additions to our membership, since state convention, adding our mite to help swell the grand total.

Our state president will no doubt return from the Convention so full of enthusiasm that she will be able unconsciously to impart some of it to us unfortunate stay-at-homes. She was not idle last year by any means. She traveled 10,050 miles to serve us, made eighty-five addresses, attended twenty-five conventions, beside writing 969 letters and 462 cards, each of these being helpful messages to her co-workers throughout the state.

County conventions have been numerous, but few reported to me. That of Linn county was held at "Wall street" school-house. The day sessions were devoted to business and a query box on the needs of the times, the evening hour to excellent papers and recitations. Good music helped much to enliven the occasion.

Osage county convened at Burlingame, in the Baptist church. The church was trimmed with golden-rod and knots of yellow and white ribbon. Miss Willard's picture was given a conspicuous place. The district president, Mrs. Haines, was present and took charge of the department work. She also gave an evening address.

Mrs. E. D. Carson, of Wa-Keeney, the newly elected president of sixth district, has been superintending medal contests at Asherville. Sixteen young people were in training for the contest so that it was necessary to form them into two separate classes. A full house greeted each class. As one of the visible results, the W. C. T. U. at that place, which had been on the decline, was wonderfully revived, receiving an addition of eleven new members, the whole community being thoroughly awakened. Mrs. Carson spoke at two Sabbath meetings on the subject nearest her heart.

A most interesting report of the state evangelistic department, Mrs. Alice M. Henderson, superintendent, reached me just too late for my last general letter, but a résumé of its contents will still be of interest. It says: "Our Crusade Band has been very successful throughout the year. They held 110 meetings in Junction City, resulting in 115 souls professing to find peace with God. Forty-two of them were soldiers from Fort Riley. Two meetings were held at the Fort. The W. C. T. U. was resurrected there, and a Y. P. S. C. E. organized. Many notices of the work and workers were given through the local press. Clay Center, Emporia and Augusta were each visited and a series of meetings held with grand results. A meeting at Nickerson added forty-two members to the W. C. T. U. Miss May Jaquith and her sister have held 230 meetings during the year. God has greatly blessed their work, and a harvest of souls has been gathered for the Master."

Mrs. St. John and Miss Edith Hill have each a pastorate and are much missed from our evangelistic department.

More earnest helpers are needed in this department as the calls are more than we can supply.

FROM FAR-AWAY OREGON.

Mrs. Narcissa W. Kinney has made her first lecture trip since her memorable one years ago when she was Narcissa White, and thought Oregon was away off, almost beyond the fence of civilization! She has not lost her old time enthusiasm—her power of holding an audience—her winning manner, nor the deep, rich tones of her voice. She started out on September 20, spoke for the Woman's Association in connection with the state fair at Salem, likewise for the Salem W. C. T. U., then at Newberg, Lebanon, Junction, Shedd, Eugene and as far south as Roseburg, and home by Albany and McMinnville.

I hear that everywhere she was the means of bringing money into the generally depleted treasuries, and never failed to elicit enthusiasm from her large audiences.

Our other workers have been likewise on the wing. Mrs. Harford made a very successful summer tour, but my convention report caused me to delay the notes of it. Now they would be too stale to reproduce, as she has been off on another trip lecturing conjointly with her husband. They stay two days in each place, she occupying one evening and he the other. Mrs. Harford says she can average ten to fifteen meetings a week and not be "one bit tired."

Her canvass for state school superintendent on the prohibition ticket was very useful to our cause, and considering it was the poor, despised party, her net gathered in a great many votes.

Mrs. Unruh has been likewise traveling and speaking in the interest specially of the L. T. L's. From several points where these two ladies have visited come appreciative words of their visitations. Mrs. Whitman, press superintendent at Weston, writes: "It does us good to have our leaders with us." From Union and Heppner, east, and Gardiner, south, come like words of appreciation. Heppner seems just now a very live union. Their L. T. L. is flourishing. They have been making petition efforts for Sunday closing, likewise working for social purity. They have a public reading room, and their own headquarters. They gave lately a successful "butterfly social."

Mrs. Additon has taken many unions as stopping places on her way to the National Convention, both in this state and others. From the Omaha Woman's Weekly I cull this:

"Mrs. Additon, the W. C. T. U. state lecturer of Oregon, who was with us last week, was a very interesting speaker. It was unfortunate that her coming should have been in the midst of 'our campaign,' when the women were so busy, but those who heard her were highly pleased, and we hope a return trip may be arranged on her way home from the National Convention."

Her specialty is of course in line with her own department,—wage-workers. Speaking of her, I must not forget her home union of Mt. Scott, near Portland, where they hold gospel services each alternate Sunday, which otherwise would be a vacant day. Likewise must I mention a very interesting feature, a Japanese W. C. T. U., organized by her, with thirty members from the flowery and warlike kingdom.

To the mention I made last time of the Multnomah convention, I must add now that of the mothers' meeting with this subject: "The coöperation of the father and the mother in the home," likewise the pleasant parlor social held at Mrs. Kern's.

A good work among sailors is going on all the time in Portland, in which the Central W. C. T. U. is much helped by Mr. N. S. Fletcher. Having been himself a sailor for many years, he understands sailor-nature and knows how to meet its wants. In Astoria, efforts are being made to reach the sailors of that place, and those visiting it. Astoria has been waging a successful war against the harmful cigarette; with the result that almost one entire school building is pledged against its use. One of the local papers says, "one scarcely sees a boy now smoking a cigarette."

In consequence of the hard times the ladies have made themselves into a kind of relief corps, and have made and given away much clothing to the needy. The Rescue Club continues its useful work, and latterly the L. T. L. presented it with twelve dollars, the result of their "hard times" social.

The Roseburg union (reorganized last year) gained for itself many friends at the time of the G. A. R. encampment by its gaily decorated barrel filled with ice-water. At the request of the citizens it remained standing afterwards to be replenished by them during the hot weather. They likewise promised to aid in the erection of a drinking fountain. To the petition of this union the new soldiers' home is indebted for its freedom from the danger of the usual intoxicants at such places.

The Union county convention was held about midsummer at LaGrande, when there was a good showing of superintendents and delegates. Mrs. Sade Clark was reappointed as president.

The L. T. L. drill was ably conducted by Mrs. Eaton, and the evening meeting enlivened by music and recitations.

The new Refuge Home building, with its beautiful location, and its very efficient superintendents, Mrs. Updegraff and Miss Barrett, bids fair to be even more useful in the future than in the last nine years. Mrs. Mead, state evangelist, is unfailing in her Sunday ministrations and many have been the "brands plucked from the burning."

Two new unions have latterly been organized: Belmont with Mrs. Hodgson, and North Portland with Mrs. L. L. Whitney, as presidents.

VERMONT.

A QUARTERLY REVIEW.

My report this time will consist chiefly of notes and jottings obtained by different sources from all over our state.

Our state paper, which has been so ably edited for two years by our state secretary, Mrs. G. E. Davidson, is now edited by Mrs. Mary S. Morgan, of Wilmington. The October number comes to us with a prefix to the name we love so well, Vermont Home Guard. Our honorary president, Mrs. Esther T. Housh, writes in her letter: "There is a great deal in this name to me, for the state itself depends upon the home, and the home so much depends upon the dear women who guard its inner life." The white ribbon sisters of our state give our new editor a cordial welcome.

One of our bright, wide awake Vermont members is sending Minshell's root beer leaflets to all the W. C. T U. state presidents at her own expense. She is worthy of being praised in thus showing how willing she is to spread reliable information concerning this question of one of the "little foxes."

The first convention of the Loyal Temperance Legions of Caledonia county was held in the Methodist church in St. Johnsbury. Companies B, C, D, E, F, and G were well represented. About one hundred and twenty-five children and young people were present. Mrs. Kenyon, our state organizer and superintendent of children's work, was present, and added much to the interest of the occasion. The exercises were interesting and all the Legions acquitted themselves creditably.

In the afternoon a county organization of the L. T. L. was formed, and the National constitution adopted. A fine program made the day full of interest to the young people. Mrs. Kenyon has spent some time in this county, and better work is expected the coming year as the result of her enthusiasm and earnestness.

The union in Waterville is still in its infancy, hardly knowing how to work. At present they have only nine members, but they feel the cause is right and they must succeed.

In Rochester Mrs. Kenyon has addressed the new L. T. L. Mrs. Beemen, of Montpelier, gave the union an interesting talk recently, and Mrs. M. E. Arnold, of Florida, has given them an address on social purity.

Five unions in Orange county have received five souvenir medals in testimony of the help they have given to the Temple. Cannot other unions do likewise?

Membership of the Wilmington union has largely increased since last May. In June a petition, signed by all the members of the union, was presented to the employer of the Italian laborers, asking that he use his authority to prevent the furnishing of intoxicants to the young men and boys of the town by the Italians in his employ. This union has recently purchased one thousand leaflets of the W. T. P. A., a large proportion being distributed at the town fair.

Mrs. Julia M. Walker, an earnest member of East Arlington union, who has not been able to leave home to do temperance work, has yet been busy doing what she could with flowers, fruit and temperance clippings. This is a good service, and many more can do the same, and thus add their mites to the good work.

One of our Vermont sisters writes: "I think Miss Willard's prayer for the coöperation of every white-ribbon sister in making THE UNION SIGNAL that factor for good which it so richly deserves to be, is being answered more abundantly than she dared ask or think. This inspiration to work for the paper will reach some member of every union, and be carried even to the ends of the world."

At our state convention Mrs. Laura Hezer, of Rochester, presented a resolution to petition the legislature to grant the right of suffrage to the women of Vermont. This resolution was carried by a rising vote, and with but two dissenting voices.

In October, at the time when our woods were full of autumnal glory, the L. T. L's of Bristol gave a concert from an exercise entitled, "What shall the harvest be?" The Baptist church was very prettily decorated with fruits and autumnal leaves. Our W. C. T. U. banner hung in front of the pulpit, the Band of Hope banner on one side, while the state banner of the Y's, with its lovely emblem flower, the trailing arbutus, held a prominent position on the other side. The church looked beautiful, with the electric lights brightening everything. And the sweet, eager faces of sixty-six children, loyal little temperance folk, was the crowning feature. The children went through the entire program without a mistake. At the close of the exercises the young girls passed the collection boxes, with bows of white ribbon attached to them, and obtained quite a sum to further the work. Our superintendent of this department, Mrs. F. W. Nash, is heartily in sympathy with the children's work, and deserves great praise.

Gospel temperance services, conducted by the Bristol W. C. T. U., are held once a month, Sabbath evenings, alternately in the three churches. The pastors are earnest in temperance work, and with a loyal band of white ribbon women we must succeed. The exercises consist of essays, reading of selections and singing by the L. T. L's. These services are very helpful to all.

Our great National Convention is over. Widely separated states and territories have been brought together by their delegates. Greater knowledge and wisdom of a practical nature, with love and inspiration for future work, will be the result.

"Remember them that are in bonds as bound with them."

Election is over. As the smoke of battle rolls away white-ribboners begin to inquire anxiously as to their cause. Has it been helped or hindered by results? A Republican legislature has been elected. We believe we have too many friends of the home among their number to permit a vote for the resubmission of our prohibitory law to pass.

Prohibition of the liquor traffic incorporated in state constitutions was twice adopted by this state previous to the fall of 1889. At that time it was again submitted to the vote of the people as a separate clause and adopted by a majority of about ten thousand. It has proved a great blessing to the state and is indorsed by the better class of citizens everywhere. It is as well enforced as any other law on our statute books, much better than some. In view of all these facts it is simply an insult to the intelligence of our people to talk of resubmission. Nevertheless, every legislative winter finds a lobby well supplied with funds clamoring in our legislative halls for resubmission and it is to this combat that loyal white-ribboners are compelled to rally year after year.

Believing that "an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure," many unions, pursuant to the instructions given by the state executive committee, have for the past two months been concentrating their efforts towards the following object: To secure the election of legislative candidates pledged against resubmission and the defeat of those favoring the same. In Marshall county many meetings were held, this being one of their prime objects. The interest and attendance were inspiring and resulted in the only doubtful candidate pledging himself to vote against resubmission should he be elected.

Brookings union reports similar good work along this line. Mrs. Anna Simmons, our talented vice-president, has been speaking over the state, making an appeal to voters to elect good men. Mrs. M. K. Patten, state superintendent of legislation and petition, will soon send out for circulation by the unions of the state, petitions to the legislature against resubmission.

At our state convention, Mrs. Cranmer, our president, and Mrs. Simmons, vice president, were delegated to remain at our state capital during the session of the legislature to look after the interests dear to our organization. The funds to meet their expenses will be raised in main by the unions. Clark, Willow Lake and Hazel have already responded. Despite the deep financial depression in our state loyal white-ribboners will not allow our cause to languish for lack of funds.

Much good work in the lecture field has been done throughout the state during the fall. Our devoted president, Mrs. Cranmer, has been on the wing ever since the state convention in September. She has addressed thirty-six meetings. She has organized unions in Athol, Raymond and Northville.

Our staunch friend, Capt. Van Etten, of Highmore, has been doing good service on the rostrum in some of the central counties.

The lectures of the Rev. E. O. Taylor throughout the state are everywhere received with great favor. We heartily commend him to temperance organizations everywhere.

Mrs. Henrietta Skelton, National organizer, has been at work in the Black Hills district with good success.

Valley Springs, Highmore and Hot Springs report effective work in the way of public meetings in which local speakers have been enlisted and the talent of children in the way of songs and recitations utilized. At Hot Springs the soldiers' home has not been forgotten.

The fifth Sunday in months having that number is given to the union for temperance service in the chapel, and it is needless to say that its members are prompt to avail themselves of the privilege.

All South Dakota mourns the loss of our beloved Mrs. Woodbridge. Memorial services have been held by the Aberdeen union. Those of us who were privileged to enjoy her gracious presence at our state convention and to listen to her eloquent addresses, are simply mute with grief. White-ribboners of this state will ever cherish her memory with tender affection. "She, being dead, yet speaketh."

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

A SUCCESSFUL entertainment and oyster supper was held by the ladies of the W. C. T. U. of Mt. Washington, Pittsburgh, Pa., last fall.

PLYMOUTH, Ill., W. C. T. U. has had a comforting uplift, by calling Mrs. Lucia H. Adliton, of Lents, Oregon, for a series of talks on temperance as related to the labor question.

THE post executive meeting at Cleveland passed a resolution of appreciation for the action of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union in organizing local and state auxiliaries made up of women.

NORRIS CITY, Ill., union, like so many others, is composed of busy working members whose lives are a constant self-denial, but nevertheless they responded to the call and sent a good offering to the National.

A VALUED correspondent of THE UNION SIGNAL, Miss Kate Lunden, of New York, and Mrs. Josephine Princell, of Minneapolis, both of them educated Swedish ladies and devoted white-ribboners, are beginning a work among the women of their own people, in the churches, and by permission of the pastors in the latter city.

NOTWITHSTANDING its protest, our National president insisted on making over securities to the amount of $5,000 to the National W. C. T. U., that it might not be felt by any that during her protracted absence in England she failed to render a quid pro quo to the treasury of the National W. C. T. U. Much as they were loth to gratify her wish, this was finally done.

MRS. J. G. HAUSER, ex-president of the India W. C. T. U., is to be in Chicago for a brief time, and while here is open to engagements for her illustrated lecture on India. She is a fine speaker, and with her twenty girls in native costume gives a unique and entertaining evening. Local unions, missionary and young people's societies in city and suburbs will be specially interested in this, and can obtain information as to terms, dates and all particulars by addressing Mrs. Hauser at 1115, The Temple.

ONE of the most enterprising ventures of a W. C. T. Union that has come to THE UNION SIGNAL office of late is The Bazar Bulletin published by the unions at Butler and Bloomingdale, N. J., to advertise their December Fair. The large sheet is of eight pages and the space not devoted to advertising business firms has been well utilized by reading matter concerning the W. C. T. U. and their own coming entertainment. The paper is a monument to the enterprise and industry of its promoters, and augurs success for the unions.

MISS C. S. BURNETT, who was so long state organizer for Ohio, and then for Nevada and California, has again entered upon active service and is now at work in West Virginia, where she is employed as state organizer. In two months she has organized nine unions and lectured over forty times, besides doing much other work. Her friends will be glad to know that her health, which was greatly impaired by long service in the field and the watchings with her invalid mother who "went home" some time ago, is now fully restored and years of service seem before her.

A UNION SIGNAL reader, Mrs. D. E. Hathaway, Marion, N. Y., asks, "Will some one give information through the columns of THE UNION SIGNAL, or otherwise, in which number of this paper of about one and a half years ago, can be found a method of distributing literature, by members choosing from a book made from leaflets and catalogues. Such leaflets as they wish to hand to a friend or enclose in a letter, and sending for such list, the book to be kept in the union for continued use. These are all the points I can recall, and they may not be just correct. An early answer would greatly oblige one who wishes to use this method."

MRS. MARY B. WILLARD has recently added to her school for girls in Berlin, Germany, the seminaire for older pupils conducted by Frau Dr. Hempel, a German lady of high reputation for scholarship in that city. This adds to the previous advantages of the school a large normal class as day pupils. Frau Dr. Hempel has had a long career as a teacher of German to foreign pupils and the fact that she has charge of this department of instruction in Mrs. Willard's school is a sure token of the thoroughness and value to English and American young women of becoming pupils in an institution which is now nearly ten years old and has gained a strong hold on the respect and regard of all its patrons.

Cor. Secy's Notes.

DEAR WHITE-RIBBON SISTERS:—It is not an easy matter for me to take my place in this column of Corresponding Secretary's Notes. I think I may frankly say I have shrunk from nothing so much since your representatives honored me so highly at Cleveland two weeks ago. Not that I have dreaded the writing, for my last year's work would have rendered that easy, even if I had had no previous experience, but in no other way did Mrs. Woodbridge come so closely in touch with the entire sisterhood from week to week as through this column.

I feel for you the shock with which you will recognize another signature; I know how hard it must be to think of another as filling her place, and so it has seemed to me that the simplest and best method through which I could inaugurate my own work would be by means of a personal letter, in which I could say to each one from my inmost heart, that I grieve with you; that you cannot honor her beyond the measure which has always filled my heart, nor love her more than I would have her loved. She was my friend. The loss of all is my especial loss.

I have no thought of filling her place in your hearts; that, with us all, must be held sacred to herself. But I shall try, God helping me, to fill to the utmost of my ability the duties devolving upon the corresponding secretary of the National W. C. T. U. What the "utmost of my ability" shall be must depend very largely upon the help I receive from you. I cannot do this work alone. May I not feel, as I am sure she felt, that I am upheld everywhere by the faith, the prayers, the love of our great company of true-hearted women? Many of you have already given me promise of this. I shall take these promises as an earnest of the great volume of prayer which will rise everywhere from consecrated hearts, and which, in remembering the work, cannot fail to remember me.

I shall doubtless make mistakes; will you not cover them with the mantle of your beautiful charity, believing that they are only mistakes? Will you not come to me, frankly, with any criticism or suggestion, as well as with any request for service in any way?

Please believe that the central pulse of my being beats for our great work and for the establishment of Christ's kingdom upon earth; believe also, that my highest wish is to serve you in your work for that kingdom.

Can we not emphasize this year as never before, the observance of the noon-tide hour of prayer? We are asking other organizations to join us in its observance; let us see to it that no white-ribboner ignores it. Let us make it what it may be to us—a secret of power, a hiding in the Almighty. Whenever the clock strikes twelve at National headquarters, rest assured that whether many or few be present, that hour will be observed. Send your own thoughts sometimes in your petitions towards the center, as ours will surely go over the circumference of our constantly widening circle.

The keynote of the Cleveland Convention was "Organization." This was made manifest by the fact that our list of National organizers was there increased until it now numbers twenty-eight. At a recent meeting of the general officers it was voted to ask each state president to work during the coming year to increase her membership by at least five hundred. We sincerely hope this may be set as the minimum of effort, and we are expecting many states to largely exceed that number.

The corresponding secretary has been made superintendent of the work of organization and chairman of the board of organizers. Letters will soon be issued to each state president asking if they can coöperate in the work of keeping these organizers in the field; but I trust if there is a state now ready for the services of an organizer its president will not wait to hear from me directly, but will write at once.

It is only by passing along the light God has given to us that the world is to be brought out of darkness.

The principles upon which the W. C. T. U. is founded are the principles of the kingdom of heaven. We hasten the incoming of that kingdom whenever we bring another woman truly into our ranks, so that she becomes heart, mind and soul, a white-ribboner.

If we had each been as diligent in the past as we might have been, our cause would have made far greater advances, and the world of to-day be, by just so much, nearer the millennium. Let us not look backward in regret, but forward in hope and purpose.

What state will first pledge; what state will first secure this additional five hundred?

Yours in faith, hope, love and effort,

KATHARINE LENTE STEVENSON.

The Temple, Chicago.

Treasurer's Corner.

After the rush of Convention work, the treasurer is glad to slip quietly into her "corner" for a chat with the women who stand so grandly back of the National organization. I could but wish as I listened to our president's address, the inspiring reports, and other good things, that thousands of our earnest local workers could have been there and been cheered by these encouraging reports, that they in their faithfulness have helped to make.

What would the report of the National treasurer have been had it not been for the thousands of home women who have poured their mites into the National treasury? Think of the ten cent fund that has really burdened no one and yet added nearly three thousand dollars to our income the past year. Had it not been for this special fund and the bequest of George P. Rogers, of Connecticut, we would have had no balance on the bright side of the ledger.

I have a creed that the treasury belongs to the women and that they have a right to know its condition and its needs, and am convinced, as I said at the Convention, that the National has a constituency back of it that can be trusted in any storm, financial and otherwise, and that they only need to be apprised of its wants, to insure the supply.

The appropriations of superintendents were nearly doubled, and additional made for organizing work, and if these extra demands are met we must increase our income the present year. The financial committee recommended that in this "coming of age" year we ask every friend of the cause, man and woman, to send to the National a birthday gift consisting of as many pennies as the donor has lived years. Envelopes were distributed at Convention like this:

1873 Birthday Gift to N. W. C. T. U. 1894

Name .....

Address .....

"Thus far the Lord hath led us on."

Place gift in envelope and seal, then drop in basket or send to

MRS. HELEN M. BARKER, Treas.,

The Temple, Chicago.

The understanding was that the receipts of that evening go for work among our colored people. Eighty-four dollars and seventy-two cents came in as responses to this appeal. Will not every friend send for as many of these envelopes as she will be willing to place among her friends and see that the contents are sent to the National treasurer as a birthday gift to help push the work this year as never before? Miss Willard, all the general officers, editors of THE UNION SIGNAL, many state presidents, as well as many delegates have already contributed, and you would be surprised to see how many were one hundred years old according to the contents of the envelopes!

We trust that some of our good friends will send a dollar for each year of life God has given them. We shall be glad to furnish envelopes for distribution at meetings held to celebrate our coming of age. Why cannot each union hold a birthday meeting and use the gems from Miss Willard's address, giving information as to the great advance that has been made "since we were here," and show all that has been accomplished in our twenty-one years, and ask for a birthday gift for our National work?

If this could be done it would tide us over the months when no dues are coming in to meet current expenses and obviate the necessity of paying interest on borrowed money in order to send to superintendents installments of appropristions that they should have early in the year. Some interesting letters are awaiting mention in Corner and will receive attention next week.

HELEN M. BARKER.

CHRISTMAS IN THE HEART.

What is the thought of Christmas?
Giving.
What is the hope of Christmas?
Living.
What is the joy of Christmas?
Love.
No silver or gold is needed for giving,
If the heart is filled with Christmas love,
For the hope of the world is kindly living
Learned from the joy of God above.

—Laura Hooker.

In the pure soul, although it sing or pray,
The Christ is born anew from day to day;
The life that knoweth Him shall hide apart
And keep eternal Christmas in the heart.

—Elizabeth Stuart Phelps.

CHRISTMAS · NUMBER ·

COMPLIMENTS OF THE SEASON

Our Library Table.

SOME HOLIDAY BOOKS.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE, bound, has made its semi-annual visit to Our Library Table. This latest issue contains the CENTURIES from May to October, and makes not only a handsome appearing volume but one of valuable reference for libraries.

The Century Co., New York.

THE OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES YEAR BOOK. Many who love this poet-philosopher of smiles and sunshine will be glad to spend a few minutes with him each day. The selections are most choicely made and the book tasteful in every particular.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston and New York. Price $1.

A BACHELOR MAID. By Mrs. Burton Harrison. Published by the Century Co., New York. Price $1.25.

A pleasing sketch of the endeavor of a young woman to close her heart against the pleadings of a good man who would make her his wife, her belief being that the best womanhood could only be developed in single life. Other would-be "girl bachelors" will read the story interestedly.

OF SUCH IS THE KINGDOM, and other poems, by Anna Olcott Commelin, is an elegantly made book, presenting exterior attractions to which the contents well correspond. A volume of poems is apt to be uncertain in general merit. Mrs. Commelin's collection of verse here mentioned is, however, satisfactory in that the poems are bright and adequately brief. The volume is such an one as is pleasant to have lying ready to one's hand for restful moments. The themes are varied and ably handled.

Fowler & Wells, publishers, New York. Price $1.50.

THREE BOYS ON AN ELECTRICAL BOAT. By John Trowbridge. A typical "story for boys"--brimming over with romance, adventure, heroism, withal not hurtful, touched with science and true to the noblest traits of character.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston and New York. Price $1.

GALA DAY BOOKS. By Frances Isabel Currie. Four volumes. Illustrated.

Each of these tastefully gotten up volumes contains three juvenile stories having for themes the various gala days of the year. The four volumes make a very pretty series of twelve stories for a year.

Hunt & Eaton, New York; Cranston & Curts, Cincinnati. Price $1.50.

WHEN MOLLY WAS SIX. By Eliza Orne White. Illustrated. Short, sparkling stories about a bright child,—one story for each month of the year, introducing the red-letter days of the calendar such as St. Valentine's, May Day, Christmas. A suitable present for a six-year old who expects Santa Claus to remember her.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston and New York. Price $1.

BEFORE HE IS TWENTY. Five Perplexing Phases of the Boy Question. These five Phases are severally discoursed upon by Robert J. Burdett, Frances Hodgson Burnett, Edward W. Bok, Mrs. Burton Harrison, Mrs. Lyman Abbott. Here in a nutshell—or five nutshells—are most practical and sound advices to parents. This is a book that would be welcome in the mothers' meeting department of W. C. T. U. work.

Fleming H. Revell Company, Chicago and New York. Price 75 cents.

ROYAL HELPS FOR LOYAL LIVING. Daily readings for a year from the seers and poets of all ages. Compiled by Martha Wallace Richardson. Thomas Whittaker, publisher, 2 and 3 Bible House, New York. Price $1.

This is a delightful and helpful year book. God's Word, a text for every day and hearty words of cheer from God's honored servants, both in prose and praise are to be found on every page. The selections are exceptionally good, and a number of tender and comforting poems are given in full.

THE BEREAN SENIOR LESSON BOOK; THE BEREAN INTERMEDIATE LESSON BOOK; THE BEREAN BEGINNER'S LESSON BOOK.

These books contain the International Sunday-school lessons for 1895, arranged severally for senior and intermediate students and beginners. Each book contains maps, the lesson expositions, home-readings, questions for home study with a helpful descriptive index.

Published by Hunt & Eaton, New York. Cranston & Curts, Chicago. Price each 15 cents.

ST. NICHOLAS for 1894. Two volumes. This is a handsome gift for the young folks, as the two volumes together furnish over a thousand pages of healthful interest and amusement that children who are readers cannot soon exhaust. Good reading matter lessens the possibility of minds being poisoned by hurtful books and papers, and money spent in this way is better than unavailing tears and efforts after bad seed has taken root and is hurting the whole life.

Published by the Century Co., New York. Price for two volumes, $4.

CHRISTIANITY IN THE HOME. By Theodore L. Cuyler, D. D.

"No two words have a more vital importance than Christianity and Home," is the significant opening sentence of a book replete with words of gold concerning this vital foundation of every family—Christian life and experience. In thirty-six short and pithy chapters this keen and spiritual-minded thinker discourses upon varied phases of home life, the following chapter heads indicating their trend: "The Conversion of Children," "Extravagant Living," "The Home Side of the Drink Question," "God's Cure for Worrying," etc.

The Baker & Taylor Co., 5 and 7 East Sixteenth St., New York.

CHILDHOOD IN LITERATURE AND ART. With some observations on Literature for Children. By Horace E. Scudder.

The study begins about Homer's time and is carried interestingly down the centuries, pausing at the days of the Holy Child and discussing fact and fable concerning Him, considering the place of children in mediæval art, in English literature and art, in French and German literature, pausing for a visit with Hans Christian Andersen, lingering but a brief time with the brain-children of Bryant, Lowell, Holmes, Cowper, Goldsmith and Gray, Whittier and Longfellow and other well read authors. Mr. Scudder succeeds in making his friends feel that the book world would be as drear without the touch of child-life as the actual world made so habitable by their presence.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston and New York. Price $1.25.

WHITTIER'S COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS. Cambridge edition.

This is based upon the original Riverside edition, but completer. A condensed biographical sketch and a preface from Whittier's own pen—the same as prepared for the Riverside edition—precede the very complete collection of poems. A full appendix contains early and uncollected verses, poems printed in the "Life of Whittier," full notes, and a chronological list of his poems.

In one of the breezy little rhymes that fall so naturally from a poet's pen-point, Mr. Whittier says to Lucy Larcom at the close of a letter in verse:

"God grant that in the strange new sea of change wherein we swim,
We still may keep the good old plank of simple faith in Him!"

Therein is the keynote of the poet's strength and sweetness,—simple faith in Him.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston and New York.

JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER. LIFE AND LETTERS. By Samuel T. Pickard. Two volumes.

"To those who have loved Whittier as a poet whose utterances have quickened their religious spirit, and given expression to their highest and holiest aspirations, the pages of this memoir devoted to his political activities, and a reform long since happily accomplished, may seem of small interest." . . . These words from the preface indicate that in these two volumes Whittier is presented, not only as a poet and a man, but as an American who was wide awake to his country's best interests. Not one line that the sweet singer penned can seem weaker because the hand that moved across the page, handled a ballot with intelligent zeal. The study of our best authors as citizens is one of the finest studies young people can pursue. The two volumes in question are a rare possession, finely edited and published.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston and New York. Price per set, $4.

THREE OF US. By Izora C. Chandler. One of the most charming holiday books before the public. The "three" are Barney, the bull-dog with the brindle patch over one eye, Cossack, "a stately Russian wolf-hound of snowy white," and Rex, a royal St. Bernard,—all full-blooded aristocrats. The author seems not to have any purpose beyond that of telling the three beautiful stories, in which human hearts as well as canine hearts are glad or sad as the case may be, in the most charming way possible and she has if anything, gone a point beyond success. "Beautiful Joe," whose excellencies are beyond question, has here three worthy rivals, whose histories are even more pathetically strange than his. But there is room in the book world for many such worthy four-footed heroes, and THREE OF US cannot suffer because of predecessors or successors. The book is readable by any one whether the reader have a companionable feeling for the dumb creation or not. The author's beauty of narration and skillful delicacy of plot compels attention and admiration, and the choice illustrations are a fitting accompaniment of the three stories.

Hunt & Eaton, New York; Cranston & Curts, Cincinnati. Price $2.

IN SUNSHINE LAND, poems illustrated. By Edith M. Thomas. Who can write such charming child-poetry as Edith M. Thomas unless indeed it be her contemporary, Frank Dempster Sherman?

"If over the sea we two were bound
What port, dear child, would we choose for ours?
We would sail and sail, till at last we found,
This fairy gold of a million flowers.
Yet, darling, we'd find, if at home we stayed,
Of many small joys our pleasures are made;
More near than we think,—very close at hand
Lie the golden fields of Sunshine Land."

Thus the poet introduces her volume of sunny song—song of everyday things, the things children love—birds and flowers, seasons and times, fables and fancies. What wee memory is not made safer against the every ready, undesirable sights and sounds, by being filled with such sunshine as such poets make?

Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston and New York. Price $1.50.

NEW STREAMS IN OLD CHANNELS. Selections from the writing of Dr. Lyman Abbott. By Mary Storrs Haynes. Introduction by Theodore T. Munger. Lothrop Publishing Co., Boston. Price $1.

This is a new volume of the "Spare Minute Series," published by Lothrop. Preëminently among our American preachers of to-day Lyman Abbott is distinguished as a masterly interpreter of the gospel in the terms of the present age, a clear and logical thinker, a concise and practical expounder; he is the representative of all that is strong, high and deep in Christian thinking, of the charity that never faileth, and of the breadth and tenderness and wisdom and justice of what is known among men as the New Theology. The selections made by Mrs. Haynes from the pulpit utterances and published papers of Dr. Abbott all bear evidence of the nobility and wisdom that underlie the spoken and written words of this remarkable preacher and editor, whose force is not so much in his oratory as in his precepts, nor so much in his manner as in his thoughts and observations.

LITTLE IKE TEMPLIN. By Richard Malcolm Johnston.

This author holds a place in American literature by virtue of the success of his character sketches of Southern life. There is the knowledge of a son of the soil in his description of life in the "big house" and life in the "quarters"; his stories are sweet with the resin of Georgia pine, and vocal with the songs of robin and field lark and all the music and hum of the Georgia fields and woodlands. In LITTLE IKE TEMPLIN, Colonel Johnston has collected some of the latest and brightest of his stories for boys and girls, although it may be said for them that they possess an equal charm for young and old. Humor, pathos, sentiment, fun and not a little homely wisdom and practical philosophy gleam in or underlie all these stories and sketches, while the dialect is so skillfully used that even the Northerner, unfamiliar with its clipped and dovetailed sounds, knows it to be the real thing, and enjoys it correspondingly.

Lothrop Publishing Co., Boston. Price $1.

THE INVALID SINGER. Life and writings of Minnie D. Bateham. Edited by her mother, Mrs. J. C. Bateham.

The name of the author of this little volume is familiar to white-ribboners as that of the National superintendent of Sabbath observance, and some may remember poems written by her daughter and published in THE UNION SIGNAL. A well and happy girl stricken down at the age of twelve by a disease that never took its hands of torture off her shrinking frame until she died in 1885, yet she has left a record of sunshine and helpfulness it would be hard to excel. Her mother tells the touching story of her daughter's heroism as only a mother can. Miss Bateham's poems are full of brightest sunshine and clear spiritual faith without a trace of the pain that must always have been behind her songs.

The book may be ordered of the author, Williamsburg, Ky.

James H. Earle, Publisher, 178 Washington St., Boston. Price 75 cents.

The Japanese Minister of Foreign Affairs has asked the public to withhold its opinion until the facts regarding the alleged atrocities at the Japanese capture of Port Arthur be confirmed.

Pekin is now reported to be the objective point of the victorious Japanese army. An official report announces that the Chinese Emperor has asked for an armistice and sent embassadors to Japan to arrange terms of peace.

The Chicago Christian Citizenship League, headed by active temperance Christian Endeavorers, is early in the field, having announced its campaign to influence the spring elections, by a direct effort at Sunday saloon closing.

The Sultan has withdrawn his invitation to the United States consul, on account of instructions given to the latter to make also an independent inquiry and report only for the state department.

IN pronouncing a sentence of six months' imprisonment upon Eugene V. Debs, and three months upon his associates, December 14, Judge Woods said: "These men were leaders in breaking the law. Ignorant men followed them and have been punished. Debs is more responsible than any of the others. He is a man of marked ability and was the chosen head of the organization now in contempt. It was in his power to have stilled all the disturbance with a word. Men who take the position he assumed must stand the consequences."

THE uprising against gambling is a notable feature of the time. In Boston the police force has been ordered to notify all hotel keepers that the game of poker must no longer be carried on under their auspices, and it is said that this decision will be of grave significance to those who play and those who with liquor and cards together have been able to induce a much larger patronage of their respective hotels. White-ribboners recognize the gambling house as part and parcel of the liquor system, and will do their utmost to help forward any movement that puts the amusement (?) of getting something for nothing under ban of law and custom throughout the nation.

AMONG the recommendations in Miss Willard's annual address was one on the exchange of Christmas gifts which was inadvertently omitted in our Convention issue. The key-note is: "If a few who are looked to as the foremost in fashion-making, would announce their intention to give only to those who really needed a helping hand, we should all hail the plan." There are many whose dollars are not numerous enough to cover the list of expected gifts and fulfill also the desire of every generous, pitiful heart—to make some poor one happy at this joyful season. By them, surely, an omission of the time-honored custom as far as friends not in "need" are concerned, would be but an act of common sense to be looked on with favor. We have always at command the priceless gift of loving words and timely greeting with which to mark the blessed season of joy. There are many little ones whose heads lie more lowly than lay His whose birth we celebrate, and though they may not be literally our neighbors, ours may be the privilege, and is surely the God-given duty, to find them and help them. Our Chieftain's recommendation has a ring greatly in harmony with the precepts of the great Teacher: "When thou makest a dinner or a supper, call not thy friends, nor thy brethren, neither thy kinsmen, nor thy rich neighbors; . . . but . . . call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind."

THE swift rolling of the months has brought us near the end of another year. Books will be balanced and closed, account of stock taken, worn out plans laid aside and new ones eagerly put forward, old leaves, blotted and blurred and stained, folded gently out of sight and the new ones of better purpose scanned with new hope. It is significant of the times that while many pass the mystic moments during which the old year dies and the new year is born in revelry and feasting, there is a saving margin of more thoughtful ones who close the old record and begin the new in meditation and in prayer. This "watch-night" service is followed by one of like character but more extended and national in its scope—the Week of Prayer. The Evangelical Alliance for the United States issues the customary suggestive program which is so universally followed. The topics are as follows, beginning with Sunday, January 6, when appropriate sermons will be preached from a majority of pulpits, the suggested text being, "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength." Monday, Humiliation and Thanksgiving; Tuesday, The Church Universal; Wednesday, Nations and their Rulers; Thursday, Foreign Missions; Friday, Home Missions; Saturday, Families and Schools; Sunday, Sermons, text, "Always abounding in the work of the Lord." A new feature upon the printed program is a call from the Alliance for financial aid in view of the past stringency and the coming winter of threatened insufficient money supply. Churches are asked to take a collection for this purpose sometime during the Week of Prayer, such contributions being sent to Peter Donald, Treasurer, United Charities Building, Fourth Avenue and Twenty-Second street. New York city. The appeal will hardly be without the generous response it so surely merits.

WE learn that some women are moving in what is called by the secular press an "Anti-W. C. T. U. Movement," namely, to secure the opening of the churches for a lunch counter and reading-room for workingmen as an antidote to the saloon. So far as such a movement is concerned, any one who will read the annual address of our president will see that the idea is by no means new, but was earnestly urged by her years ago, and the W. C. T. U. would rejoice to help onward such an enterprise. We need not say that the advice of Dr. Rainsford, the Episcopal minister in New York, who says the church ought to furnish the liquors and who believes in the use of intoxicants, is abhorrent to us, but we do think that a lunch counter in the church, especially in the cold weather, where hot soup, coffee and other nutritious drinks, with sandwiches and perhaps refreshment still more solid, were furnished at a low rate, would greatly tend to interest the non-church-going classes in all for which the church stands.

WHITE-RIBBON hearts will be tenderly touched by the sad news that comes to us during this Christmas tide. For some time it has been known by a few that our "Daniel Webster of the temperance reform," Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap, was suffering with a fatal disease—cancer. Her strong hope of recovery and her sensitiveness concerning the mention of her malady have prevented any reference to the seriousness of her condition, for we wanted to bear her up not only on wings of prayer, but on wings of faith and victory. But now word is received from her family that the end may come at any hour, and Mrs. Lathrap herself recognizes the inevitable approach of the Reaper, and is calmly and triumphantly awaiting His visit. A telegram sent Miss Willard confirms this. The message was signed by herself and reads: "The chariot swings low; resigned; sweetly trusting." The silent sickle has been among us often of late and cut off those in high places and beloved of us all. May Mrs. Lathrap's last days be full of the Victory which overcometh death.

THE annual meeting of the National Civil Service Reform League was held in Chicago, December 12 and 13. Its delegates represented the advanced thought in the cause of political reform east and west. The president, Hon. Carl Schurz, in his opening address, delivered before an audience which filled Central Music Hall, discussed the "Necessity and Progress of Civil Service Reform," setting forth as its simple and reasonable demand that the "business part of government shall be carried on in a business-like manner." In his arraignment of the spoils system, he called special attention to abuses resulting from the dependence of women government employés upon individual "influence." There had been, he said, since the enactment of the civil service law, gratifying progress along this line in every department of national government with one conspicuous exception—that of the treasury department. He also noted the marked advance along state and municipal lines both east and west. Laws for civil service reform will only reform, he declared, when the enforcing power is in the hands of an honest and faithful executive. This is a point the Prohibitionists have been contending for all along, and getting abused for. "The Decalogue itself," declares Mr. Schurz, "would become a farce if left for enforcement to the devil." And we should no more expect prohibition to prohibit under the manipulations of a liquor party than civil service reform to reform under the rule of Tammany Hall. Mr. Schurz referred to the triumph for civic reform in New York where the competitive merit system is now a constitutional mandate. "Let no exertion be spared to make the voice of the people heard," he said, "for when heard in its strength it will be obeyed." And, let us add, it will never be heard in its strength until the "better half" shall be heard not only in reform leagues and anti-Tammany organizations and civic federations, but at the ballot-box.

THE WORLD'S WANT.

BY HARRIET NEWELL SWANWICK.

THOU blessed spirit of Christmas-tide,
Come into our hearts, there to abide.

Bright star of Bethlehem, rise anew,
And guide us tow'rd all things pure and true.

Through thorny pathways our feet move slow,
O'er stumbling stones, they so weary grow.

Above us clouds—beside us the edge
Of a precipice; a narrow ledge.

With fear we tread, knowing foes are near,
Our souls cry out, "Let thy light appear."

Wrapped in ourselves, we seek but our own;
So hardened, so cold, our hearts have grown.

Give us—oh, give us true charity!
Enrich us, fill us, and set us free

From selfishness; then will our warm love
Cheer other lives, as we onward move.

Thou sacred spirit of Christmas-tide,
Forever to bless—with us abide!

THE CHRISTMAS ANGEL.

BY MRS. M. L. BUTTS.

Mr. Elwell went out banging the door after him, leaving Mrs. Elwell at the sink banging the cups and plates and platters. It was monotonous business, that dishwashing. Mrs. Elwell had stood at that sink three times a day for ten years, with short, very short and rare, intervals. She was getting tired of it; tired, too, of the endless cooking, the washing and ironing, the sweeping and dusting, the patching and darning.

Little by little, for she was naturally a sweet-natured woman, she had grown sour, cross, fretful, "disagreeable." Yes, that was the very word her husband had used that morning—"disagreeable." She would have chosen any other adjective if the choice had been hers. What woman can bear to be called disagreeable? "And," as Mrs. Elwell remarked to the crockery that she was treating so unfairly, "by the very man that I've worked myself to death for all these years."

It was a long time now since Mrs. Elwell and her husband had been growing apart. The rift was very small at first. A reproachful word; a hasty answer; brooding over the unkindness, scarcely meant to be unkind; a proud refusal to explain, or to ask forgiveness. "He don't care how hard I work, or how tired I get of this old kitchen," was the wife's thought.

"She don't see that I never take a holiday; that my business perplexes me so that I can't sleep," said the husband, going moodily to his store, his head down and his eyes studying the pavement.

So these two who would have died for each other refused to nerve themselves to live worthily, would not take the pains to plan their lives so that sunshine and inspiration might come in and help them to bear the inevitable crosses.

Mrs. Elwell wrung out her dishcloths at last, and giving them a vindictive flirt, hung them out to dry. She put the kitchen in order, made the beds, dusted the sitting room, and sat down to sew. There was an old, rainy-day coat to mend, a job that she particularly hated, and it was with no good-will that she began at the torn lining. She had taken but a stitch or two, when, at the sound of sleighbells, she glanced out of the window and saw Mrs. Moody, the wife of her husband's partner. There was a nod and a bright smile as the sleigh dashed by, a glimpse of a fresh, fair face in a fur-trimmed hood; of a neat figure in a well-fitting and becoming cloak.

"A new cloak, of course," thought Mrs. Elwell, her own old garment coming before her excited fancy. "A sleigh-ride whenever she wishes it. No wonder she looks so smiling and so young. She is three years older than I am if she is a day; why shouldn't I have sleighrides? Why, indeed?"

The question was asked in a spirit of pique. But it kept repeating itself till Mrs. Elwell was obliged to confess that there really was no reason why she should not sometimes refresh herself by a dash through the dazzling roads behind a spirited horse. She knew very well that her husband would be glad if she should give herself such a pleasure. And as for the old coat—there was Mrs. Bent next door who would be very thankful for the job and for the pay.

But it is not so easy to get out of a rut. Mrs. Elwell stitched away, making a merit of the unpleasant job, and posing to herself as a martyr.

How different it used to be in those early days of their married life! The wife's thoughts went back to them now, as she tried to fit a patch to the sleazy, refractory lining. Then the love was new, the clothes were new, life was new, and interesting and hopeful.

"Does love wear out like an old garment?" she asked herself. Was it her good angel who answered? At any rate an answer came to the silent, questioning wife. "Love is a living thing," was the thought impressed upon her mind. "It needs care, food, culture. The love that gave such happiness in those old days is sick, hungry, pining." "So am I," replied the wife's petulant thought. "Take care of yourself that you may care for your own and your husband's happiness," was the answer.

Mrs. Elwell began to grow restless and excited. At last she threw down the coat, put on her wraps, and went out into the crisp, December air. The day was bright, the sky superbly blue, the landscape shining with its fleece of late fallen snow. A few moments of motion in the delicious atmosphere, a few inhalations of oxygen, and Mrs. Elwell felt distinctly better. Her lot seemed more bearable. "I ought to go out of doors more," she reflected penitently. "I used to walk down to the store mornings with James. It always did me good. He left off asking me to go—when? When I had that craze for scarfs and 'drapes' and 'throws,' and that spell of china painting which I had no talent for whatever and never could do decently. I remember that he was disappointed and impatient because I never had time to walk with him; and at last he went off of a morning quite forgetting to kiss me or not caring to—which was it?"

Mrs. Elwell had come to the shopping streets, where in the gorgeous windows were displayed endless Christmas gifts. She grew sick at heart as she thought of the dear old holidays, of the reunions, the meetings, the gifts.

Most of her own family circle had passed from earth-life. The mother, the father, the brothers were gone out of her sight, out of her reach. Her husband seemed almost as far from her as they. She had little part now in his thoughts, his heart or himself, or so it seemed to her. No, she could not bear to think of Christmas just then. So she entered a street that led out of the town, between broad, dazzling fields and groves of crested pines.

The good angel was still busy with the wife's heart, for out there in the glorious country he could get easier access than in the airless house, among the embroidered draperies and the heavy window hangings. He directed her thoughts to the Christ-child, and the message that he brought, the message of peace, forgiveness, long-suffering. "Love is the true Christmas gift," said the angel; "love that is self-sacrificing, love that hopes all things, endures all things—the love that never faileth."

When two hours later Mrs. Elwell entered her home it was with a distinct purpose to set herself about the cultivation of this divine gift. She was eager to meet her husband, to begin at once to work out the new resolves that had taken possession of her.

The first object that met her eye was a letter lying on the table, where it had been hastily scribbled by Mr. Elwell:

"Obliged to go to New York by eleven o'clock express. Found you out when I came home to dress. May be gone a week. Better go down to Aunt Hannah's while I am away. JAMES."

Mrs. Elwell read the note over two or three times, then dropped into a chair and let the hot tears fall unchecked. Here was a disappointment that she had not counted on. That James should not come home in the regular (monotonous, she would have said in the morning) way was the last thing that she had anticipated. Their life had flowed on so evenly that the wife, perhaps the husband, too, had come to think that there could be no change.

Go to Aunt Hannah's? No, she had not the heart for that. She felt that she would be poor company for anybody in her present frame of mind. She would stay at home and put on sackcloth and ashes. But on reflection she concluded that there had been too much of that sort of thing already. She would brighten up the house, brighten up herself, and make sure of a Merry Christmas such as they had not had for years.

But first she would write to James and tell him about the new thoughts and feelings that were filling her heart and mind. And so that evening she seated herself at her desk by a cozy fire and wrote:

"MY DEAR HUSBAND:—I am not sure but that you were glad to get away from home and from your wife. I should not blame you if this were so. Our home has not been a very happy one for either of us lately. And yet a home together was what we dreamed about and planned for, once, with so much enthusiasm. I have been thinking a great deal about the reason for this sad state of things. I have come to the conclusion that we, especially I, have not taken pains to cultivate happiness. We cannot have the smallest flower without giving it the soil that suits it; and the rarest of blossoms given to our care we have neglected till it is almost dead from chill and hunger. Alas, how easy it is to neglect the little causes that make the effects we crave. I have not forgotten, James, how I used to spend time before the glass trying this gown and that ribbon that I might please you. How I used to brush my hair to satin smoothness for your sake. I was careful of every personal detail, that you might find me attractive. I have excused myself from these things, saying that I had my house to attend to, my cookery, my sewing. But my faithful attention to housekeeping has not kept your admiration, your attention. You have often insisted that I should have help. I give you full credit for that. But we could only afford cheap help, and I did not wish to leave my pretty kitchen to the mercy of an ignorant girl. You have suggested that I might teach the ignorant girl, and so find missionary work right at home. Yes, James, you have been sensible through it all. But, I cannot help feeling this, James, perhaps you might have been just a little more patient with me. But I believe patience is not expected of men, so maybe you are not to blame. At any rate, James, I am going to turn over a new leaf. I will risk the kitchen, the china, the bric-a-brac, if I may win you back. I will go to walk, to drive, now and then; I will meet my friends and yours, and invite them to our house. I will be once more your own LITTLE WIFE."

This letter dispatched Mrs. Elwell made it her first business to find help that she might, for awhile at least, be free from the coarser parts of the housework. Not that one department of the work was not as worthy as another, but she was conscious that she could not do justice to all without becoming devitalized, worn out, cheerless, unattractive. This might be possible after a good long rest; it certainly was not possible at present.

The girl secured, and she was more fortunate than she hoped to be, she set about her Christmas preparations; not a cent was to be spent in a conventional Christmas gift.

"I myself am to be my husband's Christmas gift," said the wife. "Myself, brightened, freshened, converted."

But the house was made as attractive as possible; the dinner was planned—an old-fashioned dinner like those the lovers had enjoyed in their courting days; and Aunt Hannah, whom Mrs. Elwell had not heretofore sufficiently prized, was invited to be present at the holiday reunion.

In the midst of these preparations there came the postman's knock, and a thick letter was handed to the wife. She took it eagerly and tore it open without looking at the superscription. Lo, it was her own letter of confession and regret returned to her!

Mr. Elwell had now exceeded his week and his wife had not heard a word from him. She had felt sure that at last she held in her hand his answer to her wifely outpouring. The disappointment was so great that she sank into a chair, faint and sick.

. . . . . .

"Evenin' Dispatch! Terrible railroad accident. Cars run off an embankment. Full list o' the killed an' wounded!"

From the mouth of a tiny newsboy this startling intelligence was given to Carlton street, right opposite the pretty house of the Elwells. Mrs. Elwell sat in the bay window dressed in a teagown of crimson cashmere. Aunt Hannah, in cap and spotless apron, was putting the finishing touches to the tea-table. Jane had just come in with an armful of wood for the open fire.

"Run out and buy a paper, Jane," said Mrs. Elwell.

The paper was brought; the fatal list examined.

"Thank God!" murmured his wife, "his name is not here."

But the list went on upon the next page. And at the very end appeared—"Elwell—fatally scalded. First name not known."

Mrs. Elwell did not faint, did not cry out. Her entire nature, and it was a strong one, rallied for one supreme effort to get to her husband as soon as possible. So silent was she, so collected, so energetic, that Aunt Hannah looked on in wonder. In an hour she was ready and at the station, where a train was due that would take her to the scene of the disaster.

Now came the terrible hours of interval before she could reach her husband's side. Hours that stamped themselves upon her soul never to be effaced. The monotonous sound of the rushing train became to her excited consciousness articulate with the words—Too late! Too late! Too late! All that she meant to do must now be left forever undone. How miserably poor, how flimsy, how unut-terably worthless seemed to her the rags of decoration over which she had spent time and strength. She remembered days when she sat the whole bright afternoon over her "fancy work," and was too tired and nervous and exhausted to be anything but depressing and wearisome to her husband when he came from business, needing to be toned, and brightened, and refreshed. There were evenings when at the slightest cause she would burst into tears and retire to her room to brood over her "wrongs."

As she sped on over the white, bleak country, all illusions torn away from her soul by this sudden calamity, she saw very plainly, all too plainly, that the commonest care for her health, the simplest efforts of giving herself change, fresh air, mental refreshment, would have produced quite different results. She was not meant to be a narrow, weak, foolish woman. She knew that and the knowledge only added to the bitterness of her regrets. She had fallen into the conventional way of spending her time; she had neglected the inner voice of warning. She had not taken the trouble to feed herself—body, mind and soul, that she might grow to the stature of the womanhood that was required of her.

At last those dreadful hours of judgment were over. The train ran into the semi-darkness of the long building at Westbrook station. Mrs. Elwell stood among hundreds of people, many of whom were upon the same ghastly errand as herself. A few rapid inquiries and the wife was on her way to the house of the dying man; was there; was stumbling blindly up the steps and into the room where he lay.

For the time and for many moments afterwards she was conscious only of a face so like her love's, her lost husband's,—a face that met hers as she was striving to reach a bed where was stretched—something. She was conscious only of the face and of arms that held her back when her whole being was bent upon going forward a little further. But by and by the truth pressed in, as light comes to eyes too weak to receive its first effulgence. Her love was with her, well and strong. It was James Elwell himself who was bending over her, anxious lest the great shock had dealt her a fatal hurt.

When the wife was able to receive this truth she was at once herself again, and more than the old self, a hundredfold more. Individualities develop fast during such processes as Mrs. Elwell had passed through. She listened to her husband's explanations and eagerly asked to be taken to the wife who was enduring what she herself had been delivered from. The sufferer was a cousin of James Elwell's, and a fellow traveler. When Mary Elwell was taken to the room where he laid, pain had given place to peace—deep, holy, abiding peace. And when she would have comforted the widow, lo, there was no need.

"There was never any break in our perfect confidence, never any discord in the harmony of our life together," said she who was bereaved. "He is still mine and I am his. Death cannot divide us."

"She does not need the opportunity that God has granted me," said Mary Elwell, as she pressed a farewell kiss upon the pure forehead of the woman in whom love had conquered sorrow.

During the journey home much was explained, much confessed.

"You received my letter?" said the husband in an interval of blessed confidence.

"No; not a word did I hear from you, first or last."

"I spent half a night writing to you—pouring out the pent-up feelings of years."

"And I wrote pages and pages to you and my letter came back to me."

"I left New York sooner than I expected to for a run up to Albany, and ordered all mail sent home," explained Mr. Elwell.

"We will read the letters together," said the wife smiling, "but, oh, I might have read them alone, alone!"

And now these two began again the life-lesson after turning the startling page that had been so full of self-revealing. Dull, monotonous, would it ever be again? The same as ever it was sure to be unless the learners brought to their aid the great interpreters—love, fidelity to duty, self-sacrifice, and not the least of all, common-sense.

It was at the end of a chill, cloudy day that the Elwells reached their home. There were stray flakes of snow falling here and there, presaging the storm that was coming. Aunt Hannah received them with tears of thankful joy.

"Such a pity that you couldn't have got home in time for Christmas," said she when they were seated cozily at the tea-table.

"Why, to-day is Christmas!" said the husband and wife in chorus, smiling into each other's faces.

"And you haven't thought of it?" asked Aunt Hannah, looking incredulous.

"No, not once, auntie," said the happy wife. "But all day long we have been traveling in the company of the Christmas angel."

CHRISTMAS GIVING.

BY KATHARINE LENTE STEVENSON.

There are doubtless those who feel that Miss Willard struck the blow of an iconoclast when she asked the recent National Convention to take action on the matter of Christmas-giving, with the thought of confining the practice to those who have real needs.

There are many others who will feel that the readiness with which the executive committee indorsed the recommendation is only a sign of the restlessness and discontent with which this custom is being more and more regarded by thoughtful minds.

In itself the custom is a beautiful one, and the impulse prompting it divine. It is surely meet that the day which celebrates God's great "gift" to the world should be made a festival of giving. It is surely meet that there should be one day in the busy round of the three hundred and sixty-five when each one shall "think on the things of another" and recognize, in an especial degree, the great central fact of the universe that love must give and that by only so much as it gives is it worthy the name of love.

It is meet that the "good will to men" which inheres in each human breast and is one of the most blessed proofs that,

"As trailing clouds of glory do we come From God, who is our home," should have a special time set apart for its universal expression.

All this inheres in the true thought of Christmas giving. This has lighted the yule-logs and emblazoned the Christmas trees; laughed out in the chimes and sung out in the carols; filled the stockings of the children and inspired the legends of Santa Claus and Kris Kringle. This has made us realize again and again in gladness of soul the essential fact that it is infinitely "more blessed to give than to receive."

But what is giving? What constitutes true Christmas giving? Is it measured by the monetary value of the gift? Is it a thing to be weighed in the balance of obligation and settled by the nice scales of gifts previously received? Is it a system of book-keeping in which the debit and credit columns are to be kept carefully balanced? Is it an institution in which zeal is to outrun prudence and generosity laugh to scorn the plea for honest dealing issuing from the depths of the pocket-book itself? Truly it would seem so.

Who among us can plead "not guilty" to the charge of having far exceeded the limits of righteous generosity at some previous Christmas? Who among us has not omitted some weightier obligation of benevolence because of this tithing of mint, anise and cummin? Who can say that she has not at some time given where the heart did not really prompt, but where memory said: "She gave to you last year"? Who has not found herself, almost unconsciously, wondering if the gift she is "paying back" cost as much as the one she received? I heard of a lady who, on receiving a gift from an acquaintance, calmly asked, "Now, how much did this cost? I always like to return value for value." A crude statement of the case, no doubt, and one hardly in accord with true breeding, but—after all—do we not know just a little of the feeling? Have we not chafed at finding ourselves "under obligations" to one more in the constantly swelling ranks of those to whom we "must give" at Christmas time?

It is these extraneous matters which are eating out the heart of the goodly old custom. It was the contemplation of these which made Miss Willard declare Christmas giving an anachronism.

I speak as one who long ago struck for freedom when I say that the Christmas season can never be restored to its true meaning until we simplify the entire system of present making. Fewer gifts, less costly gifts, gifts prompted by the heart and not by a sense of duty; gifts to those who have real needs and not to those who have none; this should be the program laid down by each white-ribboner, at least, for the celebration of the birthday of her Lord.

Such an observance of His birth will not leave us physically exhausted by a round of present-hunting. Such an observance will not make love and friendship matters of barter, nor will it narrow our conception of giving to those from whom we hope to receive; but it will broaden our minds to take in the universal family of God.

And, above all, it will leave us free to learn more fully the great lesson that the truest gifts know no earthly measure; that what we give in ourselves is beyond anything we can give outside ourselves; that the ideal of all giving was that of the Son of God, "who gave His life—a ransom for many."

"The disciple is not above His Master, but every one that is perfect shall be as His Master."

THE OPIUM AND MORPHINE HABIT.

BY REV. ARTHUR J. BROWN, D. D.

On the fields of India and China, the uplands of Persia, the hillsides of Asia Minor, and in the valleys of Egypt, is carefully cultivated a flower called the poppy. Varieties of this flower are found in nearly all lands, including our own. But it is cultivated simply as a flower save in the lands mentioned. There its cultivation has a purpose, commercial and sinister.

This plant secretes a liquid or juice in considerable quantities, which when dried becomes a dusky brown substance with a disagreeable odor. This is the opium of commerce. It finds its way to America in various forms. Some comes as crude opium, either in masses or in pills. Some comes as morphine, which is the alkaloid, the active principle of opium. Another familiar form is laudanum, an ounce of laudanum containing one-tenth of an ounce of powdered opium, together with equal parts of alcohol and water. That little bottle so often found in the nursery and labeled "Paregoric," is simply camphorated tincture of opium; while Dover's powder, so carelessly used by many to produce sleep, has opium as one of its chief constituents.

The slaves of the opium habit use the drug in a variety of ways. Some eat the crude opium or morphine, careless of its disagreeable taste. Some smoke the opium in pipes. Others use it in a liquid form. This was the favorite method of De Quincey, who drank daily astonishing quantities of laudanum.

But by far the most common form is the hypodermic injection. The victim prefers this method, partly because it is cheaper (the morphine acting so directly upon the system that a given amount of the drug produces a greater effect), partly because the desired effect is more quickly produced. Morphine, or opium, taken through the stomach requires from fifteen to twenty minutes for perceptible result, while the effect of the syringe is experienced in three or four minutes.

The effects of such use of morphine are frightful beyond description. At first, indeed, there is a delightful exhilaration. The mind feels calm and happy. The mental faculties are vigorous and brilliant. Pain and uneasiness vanish and all life's cares appear to be forever banished. De Quincey has given a vivid picture of these first pleasures of opium.

But in these ecstatic joys an insidious danger lurks. The sensation is so agreeable that the temptation is strong to produce it again. In a short time, varying from two to six months, a longing for the drug is acquired—the dread morphia-hunger. As the time for the accustomed dose approaches, disagreeable sensations are experienced—nervousness, irritability, discomfort, positive pain—which increases the eagerness for the drug.

But as time goes on the amount of opium or morphine necessary to give relief also increases. Thus these two things go on side by side—the ever-increasing distress without the drug and the ever-increasing amount which it is necessary to take. By and by the patient finds that the habit is binding him in chains. He is alarmed, and tries to stop. Thereupon his agonies become simply awful. He suffers all the torments of the damned. Finally, the torture becomes unendurable. He goes back to the drug, and uses more of it than ever. He has become a "morphine fiend."

Now it is that nature reminds him of the penalty of misusing her gifts. His digestion is impaired, his stomach diseased, his blood thin and imperfect in circulation. His flesh dwindles away, and his complexion becomes ashen. His nerves are shattered, and, finally, he becomes a pale, trembling skeleton, an utter physical wreck.

But, alas, the consequences are more than physical. Cerebral degeneration, with accompanying mental and moral degeneration, takes place. De Quincey has painted a ghastly picture of the horrors such a person endures. He says that he had fearful visions. Vast funeral processions passed before him in mournful pomp. Hideous phantoms presented themselves before him. Innumerable faces waved and tossed upon the ocean which stretched before him—faces imploring, wrathful, despairing, surging upward by thousands, by myriads, by generations, by centuries. Herds of monkeys grinned and jabbered at him. Slimy reptiles crawled over him. Table legs and chairs, sofas and bedposts changed into fierce crocodiles, which covered him with cancerous kisses and held him, confounded with all unutterable slimy things, amongst reeds and Nilotic mud.

What wonder that he fled with cries of horror to increased doses of the fatal drug, doses, however, which gave him temporary relief only at the expense of still more grizzly permanent horrors! What wonder that he exclaimed in the extremity of his despair and agony, "Farewell, a long farewell to happiness! Farewell to smiles and laughter! Farewell to peace of mind! Farewell to hope and to tranquil dreams and to the blessed consolation of sleep! For I am now arrived at an Iliad of woes." Pitiable is the wreck of such a man, and the saddest part of it is the demoralization of the conscience. People who have been known as upright, honest and high-minded will resort to any act of meanness or theft in order to secure the coveted drug.

And most discouraging of all is the apparent hopelessness of reform. If the drug is suddenly taken away the "morphine-fiend" is in imminent danger of insanity or death. So pitiable do his sufferings become, that even the most stony-hearted take pity upon him and deem it an act of common humanity to give him the drug he craves. On the other hand, if the dose is gradually diminished, either by himself or by his friends, it is often found impossible to get below a certain point without producing more suffering than flesh and blood can bear.

Buck's "Reference Handbook of the Medical Sciences" says that "there comes a time in the life of every opium habitué when the breaking of the habit is next to impossible. A certain dominant pathological longing seems to be awakened in every part of the nervous system and the demand is simply irresistible. In fact, it comes to be incorporated as it were in the very cell structure of his nervous centers." However much, therefore, we may blame the victim for having begun the habit, however much we may truthfully say of his accountability for his condition, we must recognize the fact that a time comes when the opium habit has a physical basis, when it becomes a disease which will not and cannot yield to any power of moral suasion and which must have medical treatment for its cure.

Perhaps some may think that opium users are comparatively few. Ah, be not deceived. The habit is alarmingly prevalent. It is said that there are now over one million opium eaters in the United States, and the number is increasing at a terrific rate every year. In the records of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, there are many instances of girls thirteen and fourteen years of age, lured into opium rooms and taught a habit which made them physical and moral slaves for the remainder of their lives. The New York Evangelist says that almost every druggist will testify that the habit is on the increase among his customers, and that women are more addicted to it than men. The Chicago Tribune says that the habit is pushing its way among the upper classes. Young women and girls, who would shudder at the sight of the alcoholic drift-wrecks of the street, toboggan down the morphine hill all the faster for the ease and smoothness of the way.

Strange as it may appear, those who should have their eyes open often fall the easiest victims. Intellectual workers use it to banish their weariness. Women find it a quick method of dispelling their pain and heaviness. Writers have been known to take morphine to help them in composition; society leaders to produce vivacity of spirit and brilliancy of conversation for an evening party, and even physicians, worn by overwork, occasionally have recourse to the fatal syringe. If a list of the "morphia fiends" in almost any of our large cities should be published, if physicians and druggists were to tell what they know, society would stand aghast, and a sensation would be created comparable to nothing less than an earthquake.

How is such a fearful habit contracted? Curiosity deceives some, particularly among the young. They have some acquaintance who uses the drug, and who gives them glowing accounts of its delightful effects. The innocent and curious youth is persuaded to "hit the pipe," or to "take a shot," just for fun. It "feels good," and so he tries it again, little realizing his peril. Ere the parent discovers what is the matter, the boy is swiftly racing down the road to ruin. Others form the habit from a depraved desire for sensual enjoyment, just as they form the tobacco and liquor habit, and a few trace their fall to inherited appetite or weakness.

But by far the greater number begin with a medicinal use of the drug. A physician is summoned to visit a patient writhing with pain. He knows that morphine will relieve it, and he therefore administers it. "If he were to keep the drug in his own hands, and use it as any other medicine is used, he would not so often receive the charge of initiating his patient in the indulgence of a pernicious habit. But too often it happens otherwise. The physician, either on account of pressure of business or from a desire to avoid increased expense to his patient from so many visits, transfers the administration of the drug to the patient himself. He teaches him the law of its action, its dose, and he even provides him with the syringe, and instructs him in the hypodermic method. What wonder, then, that it often results that the physician has placed a weapon in the hands of his patient worse even than the disease he wishes to subdue? Over seventy-five per cent, probably, of all cases of the opium habit in this country, on the Continent, and in Great Britain, originate in the way just mentioned."

This is a serious charge to make against the medical profession. Indeed, I would not make it. The words I have given are not mine, but are quoted literally from "Buck's Handbook of the Medical Sciences," an acknowledged authority among medical men.

What can be done to abate this evil? Druggists can do something by refusing to sell opium or morphine, save on a physician's prescription. Physicians can do something "by never dispensing the drug except as a medicine, and by never using it then, except when other means fail; by never trusting the drug or the syringe in the hands of the patient, but always administering it themselves." Parents and teachers can do something by watching the children under their care, acquainting them with the frightful results of the habit, and thus in many instances preventing innocent boys and girls from forming it. Remember, too, oh, mother, that the paregoric which so quickly quiets the restless baby is the deadly opium.

The whole subject is one upon which there should be awakening public sentiment. There is altogether too much indifference to it. Few realize the awful peril which is making such rapid headway among us. Let every friend of humanity help in grappling with this most dreadful of monsters, and fighting it to the death.

THANKSGIVING FESTIVAL AT THE COTTAGE REIGATE.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—By the special invitation of Lady Henry Somerset, the American white-ribboners now in England were invited to dinner at the Cottage Reigate to celebrate Thanksgiving day in remembrance of the home custom. Those whose engagements allowed them to be present were Mrs. Andrew, Dr. Kate Bushnell, Mrs. Northam Fields, Mrs. Rossiter Willard and Miss Helen Hood (who was master of the ceremonies). Mrs. Osborn, Miss Gertrude Hunt and Mrs. Ward Poole were also present and greatly appreciated the pleasure of taking part on such an occasion with their American sisters. The absence of Mrs. J. K. Barney, who is holding meetings during the winter in England, was much regretted. The menu cards, which were prettily tied with white ribbon, contained favorite American dishes, and the toasts were "Our Leaders, Lady Henry Somerset and Miss Frances E. Willard," spoken to by Miss Hood and Mrs. Ward Poole; "The Home Land," proposed by Mrs. Northam Fields; "The World's and National W. C. T. U.," Mrs. Andrew and Dr. Kate Bushnell; The Woman's Signal and The Woman's Signal Budget, Mrs. Rossiter Willard and Mrs. Osborn. The unavoidable absence of Miss Holdsworth, co-editor of The Signal, was much regretted. Three cheers were warmly given for The Woman's Signal and its prosperous offspring, The Budget, and for Miss Hood, who had made all arrangements for the dinner.

At the conclusion of the dinner the servants joined with the rest to hear a Bible reading by Mrs. Andrew, and all took part in singing the white-ribbon hymns of the Crusade. The following happy suggestion was made by a white-ribboner, which all present hope will have a practical result: Let us ask our World's President of the W. C. T. U. to proclaim the last Thursday in November of each year as the World's W. C. T. U. Thanksgiving day, naming in that proclamation from year to year the many reasons for special gratitude to God in the history of our organization. Let this proclamation of the World's President be supplemented by an account of the special reasons for gratitude within each National union the world over, and re-proclaimed to each nation by its National President of the W. C. T. U. Also let the day be one for the returning of thanks by offerings for the World's work. God speed the work of the Crusade in every land, that women in all nations may have cause to "Believe the promise of to-morrow

And feel the wondrous meaning of to-day."

London, Eug, A BRITISH WOMAN.

A COUNTESS' GREETING.

DEAR MISS WILLARD:—Hoping that this letter will reach you at the twenty-first annual meeting of your National W. C. T. U., I send you the most hearty congratulations in the name of our Norwegian Women's Temperance Association. Though this is the day of your "majority" your association has indeed shown the world that you have reached the majority in a much earlier age, and we will join with you in praising the Lord for all the blessing He has permitted to flow from the united work of the W. C. T. U., both for the great temperance cause, and for the organization of women in every land.

We feel the privilege of being united with so many brave women all over the world; we hope that the good work may increase, both in America and everywhere, and above all we wish that as "For God" stands first in our motto, so it may always stand first in the heart of every woman who has joined our ranks. To Him be all the glory for every battle won in these twenty-one years! Let us praise His name!

With sisterly greeting we wish and pray for abundance of blessing from the Lord upon the World's President and her co-workers, as well as upon the whole organization in America and every land.

With sisterly greetings to you all from us all.

Yours sincerely in Him,
(KOMTESSE) IDA WEDEL-JARLSBERG,
President Norway W. C. T. U.

Christiania, Norway.

WHO'S TO BLAME?

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—My heart aches even yet at the remembrance of a scene witnessed several weeks ago. As the train pulled into Fort Dodge, Ia., I noticed that a very large crowd was gathered upon the depot platform. The expectant looks upon the faces revealed the fact that something unusual was going to happen. Soon a number of closed carriages drove up. Out of one of them stepped the keepers and two chained prisoners. Out of another carriage stepped six ladies. The interest of the crowd was all centered in one of the prisoners. He was a Fort Dodge boy, just barely out of his teens. Three years ago he commenced to tamper with strong drink and it soon became his master. As usual with drinking men, he also became the victim of many other bad habits. Drink and gambling proved his ruin. Under the influence of liquor, he killed a companion. He was tried, found guilty, and sentenced to penitentiary for life. The six ladies mentioned were his mother and five sisters. As he was put on board the train they caught him in their arms and kissed him, their awful heartbroken shrieks of, "Oh, Jack! Jack! dear Jack! oh, God! Jack! Jack!" bringing tears to the eyes of the hardest-hearted hearers. Pray tell me, who is most to blame for the crime?

CHARLES W. MCCROSSAN.

A NEW NATIONAL UNION.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—You will be glad, I am sure, to hear that Burma has just been added to the list of countries having a National Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

All the helpers who have come to us from the home land, Mrs. Leavitt, Miss Ackermann, Mrs. Andrew and Dr. Bushnell, have advised a National organization as soon as practicable, but until now the time did not seem to be ripe for such a step. But as recently we have had a number of causes for encouragement in our work, and as the matter was laid upon the hearts of some of the workers, a call was issued for a National convention, to be held in Rangoon, October 25 and 26. The call was responded to by delegates from all of the local unions, and we had a most enthusiastic and helpful convention. Various lines of work were taken up and discussed, and a children's mass-meeting was held, at which four hundred, including the children and their friends, were present.

On the second morning of the convention a business meeting was held, when, after some discussion, it was unanimously voted to organize a National union. The following officers were elected: President, Mrs. Julius Smith, World's vice-president for Burma; vice-presidents, the presidents of the local unions, namely, Miss Ranney, Rangoon; Mrs. Winston, Mandalay; Dr. Mitchell, Maulmain, Ma Mya (Burman) Maulmain; secretary, Mrs. Roach, Rangoon; treasurer, Miss Wisner, Rangoon. Five departments of work were entered upon. Evangelistic, juvenile, Burman, Karen, Tamil and Telugu, and the following superintendents chosen: Evangelistic and juvenile work, Miss Ranney, Rangoon; Burman, Miss Barrows, Maulmain, Karen, Mrs. Elwell, Maulmain; Tamil and Telugu, Mrs. Armstrong, Maulmain.

We feel that the work has received a new impetus from the convention just held, and we hope through our national organization to be able to accomplish much that would otherwise remain undone. We are sure that the interchange of thoughts and plans in our annual meetings will be a source of inspiration and help to us all.

Yours in the work, BERTHA B. ROACH,
Secretary Burma National W. C. T. U., Rangoon.

I AM very glad the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is fighting the temperance battle, but I do not think it very creditable to us men that we leave it to be fought by the women. In the old legend St. George fought the battle for the deliverance of the women, but in modern life the women fight the battle and St. George sits on the fence to see how it is going on.—Dr. Lyman Abbott.

DEAR CO-WORKERS:—We have wanted just this space in THE UNION SIGNAL for a long time and hail the welcome extended to us by the editors with keen anticipation. This is to be a "round table" about which the typical (or would-be typical) union may gather and compare experiences, propound questions, advance crisp plans for work, sound notes of encouragement and analyze causes for the reverse, presenting at the same time antidotes and correctives for such discouragement.

What think ye of it?

Our typical Local Union embraces the whole forty W. C. T. U. departments of work, so on whatever phase of endeavor your earnest soul is aroused do not hesitate to appeal to us for counsel. Indeed, it is the earnest hope for the new year that this department in our National organ will be heartily supported by the sisterhood—and we'll welcome the brotherhood, too, occasionally—at large. Write pointed, brief, gist-y letters. Ask pertinent questions. Make honest criticisms—kindly. But mark this: Should the president's gavel fall—i. e., should space give out—before your part in the program has been reached, do not be unduly "hurt." Charity suffereth long and is kind—and, I might add, is always rewarded for her kindly waiting sooner or later.

As mothers are the foundation and heart and crowning glory of the home, and as mothers' meetings hold a most vital place in the great department work of the W. C. T. U., we will now listen to Mrs. E. C. Farwell, Hyde Park, Mass., who will tell us the very suggestive story of

THE RIPLEY MOTHERS' MEETINGS.

"In the suburban town of Ripley, in April, 18—, the regular monthly mothers' meeting was held in the parlors of the First Church, there being about thirty present.

"Before the half-hour of prayer with which each meeting was opened, the names of all the children of mother-members, whose birthdays occurred before the next meeting, were read by the secretary, that these young people might be especially remembered before the throne of grace.

"The subject appointed for consideration was 'Boys and Girls in their 'Teens,' a topic which admitted of a wide range of thought and developed much discussion.

"The first question propounded was whether girls who are attending school can systematically perform some housework without shirking part of their school duties. The general opinion seemed to be that a small amount of home work was helpful to girls and boys also, and would tend to physical culture and heart culture.

"The question was raised as to how much of outside interests a school-girl should have. Many parents think their girls are studying too hard, when the trouble is they are attempting too much outside of their school duties. One of the first things to be attended to in a growing girl is that a good foundation is laid for a healthful physical life by regular hours of exercise and sleep. Her nerves should not be unduly taxed either in pleasurable or benevolent emotions.

"A short article read by one of the ladies called attention to the necessity of teaching boys independence. While we are to think for them, we must at the same time teach them how to think for themselves.

"Our president summed up the thoughts of the hour on this wise, that most must be made of the home, if the best work be done with the boys and girls during that most critical age, 'in their 'teens.' As the atmosphere of the home is pure and uplifting, or hurtful and worldly, so will our sons and daughters be molded. The subject for the next meeting was announced to be 'Physical Training —How best Promoted?'"

"And this reminds me,"—it is too bad the Ripley mothers' meetings were held before Miss Willard wrote her book, "A Great Mother." Methinks those who read the rare record so rarely told will be greater mothers and better daughters for the reading.

Have you read Miss Willard's annual address? I feel sure that if the local unions would take the address and read it little by little in their regular meetings, devoting a specified time to its consideration, it would lead to the study of all current social questions and to a more clarified opinion based on rendered reasons. It is one of the marked characteristics of the W. C. T. U. that we are not required to think alike or work alike, each local and state union being perfectly free to take up or lay down any line of action that may have been agreed upon in the National Convention. Indeed, I think it will do no harm to publish Article VII, Section 1, of the by-laws:

No state union shall be bound by any principle espoused or plan devised by the National W. C. T. U., except that all state auxiliaries must subscribe to the total abstinence pledge and to the constitution of the National union.

It is needless to say that the constitution involves no method of work whatever, except that we are all to be total abstainers and to pay ten cents a year into the National treasury.

It is said that the redemptive feature of our work is the most discouraging in the world—so few drunkards are really redeemed. However that may be, I would not try to state finally, but now and then there drifts this way a bright story of a life made new. This brother's story—for he is a "brother" now—is long, and only part of it can be quoted. He calls it

FOUR PICTURES OF A REDEEMED MAN.

"The first picture is that of a man who was doing well, surrounded by wife and children, visited by a loving mother. Through drink and dissipation he wandered far away. One day he was standing on a street corner, trembling in every limb, conscience and remorse at work, longing for a kind word and helping hand.

"The second picture is of a building, over the front entrance to which are these words: WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION. The outcast of scene first is found there daily. He listens to the testimony of his companions. He is surrounded by women who wear the white ribbon. Their words are not in vain, and at last he realizes that he has the 'blessed assurance'—a loving Saviour.

"Scene three. A little home in another part of the city. It is the home of this man's mother, whom he has not seen for two years. As he enters—unexpected—the presence of that mother, she is quick to detect the wonderful change. Her face lights up with joy, and she kneels with her two boys, and sends praise to heaven for the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

"In the fourth picture is the redeemed man in his own home. His wife is by his side, his children near by, happy because father is at home. As he looks into his wife's face, he reads there the forgiveness which he seeks."

The family circle is the only place to discuss the difficulties that may arise in the administration of home life or in the enlargement of plans advanced about the fireside. THE LOCAL UNION is a safe place to meet and answer perplexities which may arise as we endeavor to crystallize our plans in action, and we will pause right here for the brief consideration of

SPECIAL DIFFICULTIES.

QUESTION.—Is there such a society as the Somerset W. C. T. U.?

ANSWER.—Yes. It was voted at the World's W. C. T. U. Convention in Chicago, in 1893, and stands recorded in the constitution, Article 5, Section 3 (see page 297 of the Minutes for that year) that "any woman not a member of a local union may become a member of the Somerset Woman's Christian Temperance Union by signing the pledge of the World's Union and paying fifty cents annually to the treasurer of the World's W. C. T. U." The pledge is the usual pledge of total abstinence with opium added. Mrs. Ella F. M. Williams, Montreal, Canada, 55 Drummond street, is the treasurer to whom the fifty cents should be forwarded with the full name and address of the member. The Somerset Y is a society of young women students that Mrs. Barnes and her coadjutors are introducing into as many educational institutions as possible.

Q.—What is the opinion of Miss Willard of fairs and festivals for raising means for local work? Some of our women do not approve of them, and some will not even give their voice in having a sociable.

A.—I thoroughly believe in fairs and festivals as a means of raising money for local work; but I think they should be managed with care, and all the objectionable features kept out. A great many good women will work for such an enterprise that will not otherwise help us at all. We must remember what a variety of gifts need to be enlisted in reform movements. I should be glad if every local union would have a rightly conducted fair or festival to help its own work within the next three months, and I feel sure we could trust any of our local societies not to introduce features that were demoralizing, but to make the exhibition advantageous not only to their treasury but to that unassailable treasury that we call character.

FRANCES E. WILLARD.

By the passing this way of pithy suggestions, pointed questions, tried methods, this new departmen in THE UNION SIGNAL may be made most "all-around" and helpful. There is room about our round-table for all who will be brief. Will you join us?

And a certain woman, which had an issue of blood twelve years, when she heard of Jesus, came in the press behind and touched his garment, for she said, If I may but touch his clothes, I shall be whole. And he looked around about to see her that had done this thing. And he said unto her, Daughter, thy faith hath made thee whole; go in peace and be whole of thy plague.—Mark 5: 25, 27, 28, 32, 34.

A merry Christmas to all our Temple friends. May Christmas cheer and joy be yours at the love feast of the year. May all hearts be attuned to join in the song of the angels, "Peace on earth, good will to men." As we write hard times seem to be forgotten by the throng that crowd our streets, all seem intent on one object—to secure a gift to make some one happy. Letters flow into the Temple enclosing $3.65 from mite-boxes, asking that the souvenir spoon be sent in time so that it can be presented to some loved one as a Christmas gift. Orders also come for the Educational Checker game and the game of Pixies, offered by the Columbian Publishing Company, which will we are sure prove most instructive and entertaining to children during the long winter evenings. There is also quite a demand for the Temple edition of the Household Repository—which the company now offers singly for fifty cents a copy sent free of postage. Single orders for the three above articles cost $1.25, postage prepaid. The company, however, have decided to allow us to sell for one dollar, postage free, to persons sending for ten sets. If a thousand women who read these items could secure ten orders—and it could be easily done among their neighbors—making ten thousand sets, what a nice sum it would net the Temple. For particulars, address Miss Sara G. Johnson, Room 1113, The Temple.

Miss Dora Harris, of Ypsilanti, Mich., sends $25 on her personal pledge of $100. Mrs. S. S. Sickels, treasurer, sends $15 from Minnesota W. C. T. U. to apply on a $100 pledge to place the name of Mrs. Frances Neal on a tablet. Dickersonville, N. Y., W. C. T. U. sends $22 on a $100 pledge. The W. C. T. U. of Manhattan, Kansas, sends $20 on a pledge for $100. Plymouth county, Mass., sends $15 to apply on its tablet fund in honor of the county president, Mrs. M. G. Weston. Waldoboro, Maine, W. C. T. U. sends $20 as its first payment on a $100 pledge. Mrs. Emma Counts Fox, of Paducah, Ky., sends $25 from the union on its $100 pledge. She writes that they intend sending the $100 as soon as possible and says it does her "heart good to know that prayers go up every day from the Temple against our greatest enemy."

The following is extracted from a letter accompanying $37.50 from the W. C. T. U. of Neponset, Ill.: "Words fail to express the desire of our W. C. T. U. to see that noble building, the Temple, fully out of debt and belonging to the temperance women of America. This sum comes from willing hearts and is the product of labor from willing hands."

The W. C. T. U. of Warsaw, New York, sends $29, completing its $100 pledge. Wrightstown, Pa., W. C. T. U. sends $20, making $55 paid on a $100 pledge. Roxanna Rice, of the Christian Home at Council Bluffs, Iowa, sends $1. She writes that on her last birthday when she was eighty-four years old, a friend placed a dollar in her hand and she desired to exchange it for a keepsake, so she sent it to the Temple for a Columbian souvenir. This dear old woman gave to the Temple a few years ago, $100. Mrs. Wm. D. McNair, of Dansville, New York, sends $3.65 for the souvenir spoon. She writes that she made a sacrifice to send the money as she wanted to help the Temple and also to secure the beautiful souvenir spoon.

We have in preparation a little novelty for 1895, called the Temple wheel. It is in red, white and blue; it has twelve spokes; between each is a little aperture, with a seal, giving just room enough for a dime to hide itself and a place to have a name inscribed; on the back is a small picture of the Temple, giving a description of it, with directions how to secure twelve dimes for the Temple. Each person that gives a dime, and who cannot? towards our House Beautiful writes his or her name between the spokes of the wheel, and when the person who has ordered the wheel returns it with twelve dimes sealed up in it, they will receive either the beautiful Temple medallion in aluminum, with a most superb cut of the Temple on one side, and on the reverse a profile of Miss Willard and the founder, with appropriate inscription, or the new and beautiful book of the Temple, full of illustrations of the wonderful building, which we are now getting up and which will be ready for delivery by the first of the year. All who have a will to work for the Temple next year, no matter how poor, can easily get a wheel filled. We expect the boys and girls of the Loyal Temperance Legion will enter heartily into the work, and we may have a special offer for them, which we will announce later.

All persons sending $1 to the Temple will receive the beautiful Columbian souvenir. Any individual who sends the contents of a mite-box, amounting to $3.65, by January 1, 1895, will receive a solid silver Temple souvenir tea-spoon. This, however, does not apply to persons filling boxes for unions; they receive the Columbian souvenir. All money orders and checks should be made out in the name of William D. Preston, and sent to our financial secretary, Miss Sara G. Johnson, the Temple, Chicago, Ill. All other matters pertaining to the Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, the Temple, Chicago.

HEAR THE ANGELS SING.

It came upon the midnight clear,
That glorious song of old,
From angels bending near the earth
To touch their harps of gold:
"Peace on the earth, good will to men,
From heaven's all-gracious King."
The world in solemn stillness lay
To hear the angels sing.

Still through the cloven skies they come
With peaceful wings unfurled,
And still their heavenly music floats
O'er all the weary world;
Above its sad and lowly plains
They bend on hovering wing,
And ever o'er its Babel sounds
The blessed angels sing.

But with the woes of sin and strife
The world has suffered long;
Beneath the angel-strain have rolled
Two thousand years of wrong;
And man, at war with man, hears not
The love-song which they bring;
O hush the noise, ye men of strife,
And hear the angels sing!

And ye, beneath life's crushing load,
Whose forms are bending low,
Who toil along the climbing way
With painful steps and slow,
Look now! for glad and golden hours
Come swiftly on the wing;
O rest beside the weary road,
And hear the angels sing!

For lo! the days are hastening on
By prophet-bards foretold,
When with the ever-circling years
Comes round the age of gold;
When peace shall over all the earth
Its ancient splendors fling,
And the whole world give back the song
Which now the angels sing.

THE CASE OF NUMBER SEVENTEEN.

A Christmas Story.

"Number Seventeen, Mary Levis, aged sixteen, arrested for vagrancy; no home, mother dead, father intemperate; employed in a large store, but recently discharged."

So ran Number Seventeen's record as the secretary of the city board of charities read it out of his ledger; and a bad record it seemed to be.

"A clear case for the Refuge; is there any one present who would be willing to take her there this morning?" asked the secretary.

The women moved uneasily on their chairs and thought of their children's stockings; the men looked at their watches and thought of their mail, which was apt to be large the day before a holiday, and if not attended to would be larger the day after. Nobody spoke.

"As there does not seem to be any great hurry about the matter, I suppose she will have to go back to the station house until after Christmas," said the secretary, easily. It all seemed very simple, and he was busy.

"Excuse me, but that does not seem to me possible," said a clear, quiet voice from the end of the room. The secretary felt disturbed and glanced in the direction of the voice. All he saw was a slight woman dressed in black, with a gleam of something unusual in her eyes and a slight shake in her voice; otherwise quite self-possessed.

"May I ask why you think it impossible, Miss Anderson? The girl is a criminal and the station house is the proper place for her. We would be glad to hear your reasons," said the secretary, stiffly. Instead of a motion to adjourn they were to have this useless talk about nothing.

"May I ask you to send for the girl?" asked Miss Anderson very quietly, with a slight flush on her usually pale cheeks.

"Certainly. Mr. Bridges, go down, please, and bring up Number Seventeen. You will find, I think, that your trouble is wasted; the girl looks hardened and bad," the secretary said, coldly.

Number Seventeen was brought up in due course. She thought the board room a change for the better from the dark hall where she had been sitting for an hour or more. It was snowing hard outside and she was wet; the fact that it was Christmas eve meant nothing to her except a vague desire to get away somewhere.

"Mary, your record shows you have no home," the chairman began, uneasily. Mary's brown eyes were large and their hungry gaze annoyed him. "Would you be willing to live out if one of these ladies got you a place?"

"Is it live out with the likes of them?" with a scornful glance at the members of the board. "Why, I dressed better than some of them only last week. Live out, is it? I'd rather go to the devil!"

There was a moment's pause after this unheard of statement. The secretary shrugged his shoulders hopelessly.

"There seems no point in prolonging this meeting further," he said. "If a motion for adjournment may be made, Number Seventeen can be sent back to the station house." A queer little cry, almost a moan, came from Number Seventeen then, and Miss Anderson rose and went over to the desk. After a few whispered words, the secretary said to the already retiring board: "Miss Anderson has my permission, and I presume yours also, to try an experiment. She wishes to take the girl home with her."

"Will you go with me, Mary?" Miss Anderson said; and Number Seventeen, though she looked sullen and frightened, ended by following her guide downstairs.

The rest of that Christmas eve saw the testing of Miss Anderson's experiment.

"Home" proved to be a very small house, exquisitely neat and clean in its appointments.

Number Seventeen had been used to a certain kind of gaudy luxury, alternating with great poverty and some dirt, but this daintiness was not in her experience of life.

After having a bath and being fitted out with some clean, dry clothes, and a dark street dress, which showed signs of wear, but was more comfortable than wet finery, Number Seventeen had a long rest on an old, soft sofa, not too fine to lie on; and then came a good meal, Miss Anderson doing the cooking in a chafing dish.

After lunch they went out together into the busy street, with the crisp sound of the snow underfoot, and overhead the blue sky.

Miss Anderson was not rich, that was plain to the well-trained eyes of Number Seventeen, but she seemed to be very much respected and heartily welcomed, and her smile was returned wherever she went.

They were both getting very tired when they passed a church where afternoon service was going on.

"Come in here a moment," Miss Anderson said, and Number Seventeen followed wonderingly. She had passed her whole day in a dream, and this was by no means the least amazing part of it. To use her own expressive language, she "had no use for churches," and the people who went to them had never seemed to her any better than others, who professed less.

However, when she saw Miss Anderson kneel down she did the same, and presently the words of the service began to appeal to her, and one of the most beautiful prayers in the world floated down the church to her and, somehow, lodged in her heart—"Those things, which for our unworthiness we dare not, and for our blindness we cannot ask, vouchsafe to give us."

Just a little love, a little light, a little brightness, was all Number Seventeen had craved in her short life. She had tried to get them in crude ways, sometimes in evil ways, and they had seemed far away from her; but now she felt in a happy way, that the love, at least, was within her reach.

The service was over; they had left the church and were standing on the snowy pavement again. It was quite dark and the noises were more confusing than ever. Number Seventeen was seized with something very like homesickness, though she had never known a home; very like shyness, though she never remembered being at all shy. She did not want to go back to the old life, and yet she dreaded the new.

Miss Anderson was saying an astonishing thing, in her quiet voice.

"Mary, you have been very good in helping me do my errands; now, I think, I ought to be at least as good to you. These little packages are for your friends, where you boarded, and I want you to take me with you and let me help you give them away. I should like to know your friends, now that I know you. Will you take me there?"

There was a long pause; something thumped against Number Seventeen's jacket, which she could hear above the noise of the street. Presently she said, slowly, while a red flush came over her face, "I'll give them and welcome. I'm not all a bad lot, but I couldn't take you there."

Then the last pang of regret for the old life left Number Seventeen.

"You've trusted me, I was never trusted before; I'll trust you now, you can do what you like with me."

There was joy in Rachel Anderson's heart that Christmas day, and of the gifts she received, none was more precious to her than the love and trust of Number Seventeen.—Class and Club.

A CHRISTMAS MEDITATION.

BY BISHOP JOHN H. VINCENT.

There was nothing so very remarkable in what these shepherds saw. It was not an unusual thing to turn a stable into an inn for the temporary accommodation to travelers during a crowded season, but it was what the shepherds saw and what they heard before that gave significance to this vision of the mother and her babe in the city of Bethlehem. It was the angel of the Lord who stood by them and the glory of the Lord that stood round about them, and the words which the angels spoke about good tidings of great joy and the birth in the city of David of a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord, and the multitude of the heavenly host that appeared with the angel praising God—these are the things that gave significance to the scene in that lowly stable of that lowly town.

Having heard the speech of the angel and the song of the heavenly host, they made sure that this vision of the night was not merely a vision. What if after all this exaltation there should be no babe in the manger at Bethlehem? There was in what the angels said to them an implied command that they should corroborate by personal observation the testimony given. The angels said "Ye shall find a babe wrapped in swaddling clothes and in a manger." That was equivalent to a command, and so the shepherds said when the angels went away from them into heaven, "Let us now go even unto Bethlehem, and see this thing that is come to pass which the Lord hath made known unto us."

The angels sang this song of good cheer to humanity in the ears of representative men—simple, sincere, hard-working men, shepherds of Judea—and why not? A man with horny hands may have the voice of God within his heart, and as he may love his prattling babe and his faithful wife, he may love God and his neighbor in sincerity and in truth. Men of common sort are quite able to understand the simple things of the gospel. It was, therefore, not waste of truth for angels in the heavenly places to sing within the hearing of shepherds watching their flocks by night the glories of the new kingdom and the end it was destined to achieve.

Human learning and wealth and dignity may undervalue the capacity and ability of what are known as the lower classes of society. A man in financial poverty, a plebeian, the lowest plowman, does have all the elements necessary to the recognition of truth, the sense of sin, the unrest of guilt, and the peace and triumph of grace. Therefore the gospel goes to all men, and it really comes not as an after fruit of human culture, but as a very first step of preparation for all true development and enrichment. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. We should not wait until men can read and write and appreciate art before giving to them the treasures of the gospel of Christ, for that gospel should come at the very beginning. Tell the story of the gospel to the illiterate, to the degraded, to the outcast, to the discouraged, to the impotent.

How much more we have who live on the verge of the twentieth century than did the simple shepherds of Bethlehem at the beginning of the first century of our era! We have Bethlehem still standing on the crown of the old hill in Southern Judea, the plain of the shepherds stretching out from its base, the blue sky of Syria bending like a dome over the land of promise. We have the story of the babe—His sweetness, His purity, His growth in stature and wisdom and grace, but we have the history of the Man—the peerless man whose name is the most illustrious—a name above every name that is named. In all these twenty centuries of human history we have the story of His life, His works, the signs He wrought, the gracious words that fell from His lips, the story of His precious death and burial, His glorious resurrection, and the coming of the Holy Ghost whose ministries He promised. We have the history of His church, the heroes who have lived and died in the defense of the faith, the victories accomplished by the Cross and the Word and the Spirit, victories over races and kingdoms. We have the civilization which is the ripe product of His life; the institutions of philanthropy and education erected as products of His own power and righteousness, and even now in the heart of every man who will accept it there is the witness full of life and power to the fact that there has come to the world a Saviour who is Christ the Lord.

On this Christmas day do we go to our spiritual Bethlehem? Do we see the reality of Christ as our Saviour, and do we go forth as did the shepherds, full of new light to make known concerning the saying which has been spoken to us in the inmost life concerning this child, this man, this Saviour, this present deliverer from the guilt and power of sin, this anointed One through whom on Christmas days and on all days of all the years we may receive the anointing from above?—December Chautauquan.

THE CHRISTMAS SECRET THAT JACK TOLD.

BY CLARA J. BENEDICT.

THREE happy children in their play,
Romped through their father's house one day,
Ran in and out at every door,
Played soldier on the attic floor.

One child, a little girl and frail,
Lithe form, light hair, blind eyes, face pale,
Stepped on a spring, and up there came
The queerest Jack e'er bore the name.

Heels over head the little men,
Like heedless horsemen, down stairs ran,
Hats, guns and drums were flung away,
And maid forgotten in the fray.

"Hallo!" cried Jack, "I'll stop a spell,
For I have come with news to tell,
I met old Santa Claus without,
Who talking, let a secret out.

" 'For years,' said he, 'I've searched out all
The frights that trouble children small,
And naught has preyed more on my mind
Than the false scares to make them mind.

" 'Now I have traveled in many lands
In darkest nights, and shaken hands
With bugaboos of every tribe,
And know all the scares far and wide.

" 'So, my friend, if in house or street,
A timid child you chance to meet,
Tell him for bugbears not to care,
For they are harmless everywhere.

" 'I've seen so much I never told,
I'm thinking hard now I am old,
Instead of gifts as heretofore,
To send a book to every door.

" 'In it I'll tell of all the ways
I've driven round on Christmas days,
And in it, I'll place somewhere,
The photograph of every scare.'

"Good-bye, dear child, my time is out,
Those boys have turned themselves about,
Tell them the foe that turns to run
Is not the enemy to shun."

LILLO.

BY VELMA V. BEEBE.

(Concluded.)

After taking Tom home, Fred determined to look up Karl and the monkey, and make his peace. He was surprised to see in what a dingy little hole Karl lived.

Lillo had sunk into a drunken stupor, and Karl sat by him with a sorrowful face. The anger was all gone from the blue eyes, but there was a reproach in them that was hard to bear.

"Truly, Karl, I'm very sorry," began Fred. "I suppose I might have prevented it, but I didn't think as it would be so bad. The boys didn't ask me, anyhow. Lillo was drinking when I got there."

"I ought to told you. Once before I see my Lillo so; and oh, my frent, was it not so I see my vater lie an' die?"

The German boy's eyes held a flame of sorrow that burned up tears. Silently, Fred watched him as he bathed Lillo's head, and arranged the fetters so they need not hurt the little body. He had been obliged to bind the raving creature, but he would try not to give pain.

The sun hid behind the western hills, and the shadows in the little den deepened into darkness, but Fred could not bring himself to leave Karl. He found the piece of candle and lighted it, and now and then asked questions in low tones. In the same murmuring voice, Karl answered, telling how he had once hoped to study "de real museek"; but his father's love for alcohol had taken the money and the clothing and the house, finally leaving the little boy fatherless to struggle on as best he might.

Fred was much affected.

"You shall learn the real music, Karl!" he exclaimed, when the recital was over. "I've always had more money than I needed, and never did any good with it in the world. You shall take lessons of Professor Baumgarten. I'll speak to him to-morrow."

"Ah, no," said Karl, softly. "You mooch kind. I no can take him so. But if it bees I could do works for you, then I do it—if my Lillo be better," he added.

"Oh, he's going to be all right," said Fred, with forced cheerfulness. "See how quiet he is."

Karl bent over the little creature with a questioning look.

"He iss alretty det," he said, simply. "It iss goot so. I did not love him enough to be always goot mit him."

"Not good to him!" cried Fred, in amazement. "I never saw any one so good to an animal before in my life."

"Ah, but you know not all. I tells you, my frent. De organ mans, he go away fery queek. Peoples say he do sometings wrong an' haf to go. I finds poor Lillo so seek. I tink, 'he leetle monkeys, he no goot. I no can get more as enoughs to eat for myselfs. I not do anytings.' But den I tinks me of what de good Christus said. I learned it in de Sunday-schools joos dat day before—'Preach de gospels to every creature,' an' I tink, 'Lillo, he creatures. I muss to him de gospels preachin'.' "

"Surely, now," said Fred, feeling slightly uncomfortable. "That can't mean to animals. How could you preach to an animal?"

"It iss what I will tells you," continued Karl, smoothing the dead monkey as he spoke. "I ting of dat myselfs, but I tink, 'Lillo, he no unnerstans when I say I tries to liff like de good Christus, but when I bees goot to him like de goot Christus would been when he wass here, den Lillo unnerstans dat.' So I try bees goot to him. Sometimes it wass pretty hard, becauss, you know, I not at de first love him, but when I do more tings for him I loves him besser. You know it is always so."

The candle flickered and went out as Fred clasped his little companion's hand, but the morning broke, glowing in the east, growing brighter and brighter each moment. It was as if an illumination of joy were being lighted, that one heart on earth had given heed to that oft-repeated, scarce-considered prayer—

"Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven."

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—I suppose that not many of our circle are familiar with the words of the poet:

"If happiness have not its seat and center in the breast,
We may be wise or rich or great,
but never can be blest."

But these words are so very true that we may well take them for our Christmas thought Will you not commit them to memory now? Perhaps the full meaning may not come to you just at first. After thinking awhile, ask some one older to explain the words to you.

A little Christmas story which I have read may give some light on this very subject. A certain family in which there were many children had been accustomed to make and receive handsome presents on Christmas day. But hard times came, the father failed in business and there was no money for the Christmas gifts. What do you think they did? Sat down and complained at their hard lot? Not a bit of it! Shortly before Christmas the father made a little speech: "Now, children, we're going to have a jolly time, anyhow. There's lots of evergreens in the woods, and we'll trim up the house beautifully; we'll have a tree and tie on it the rosiest apples we can find; you can ornament it with strings of popcorn, and hunt up bright colored silks and ribbons to make it look gay. Each one of you can find among your treasures something to give to the other, and I shall have a gift for each one of you."

All was fun and merriment for several days. The house was festive in its green decorations; and the tree was loaded with presents without any money being needed. Everybody was remembered on Christmas day. The father's and mother's gift was the house furniture. Mary had the sofa which she used more than any one else; Caroline was given the favorite easy chair; James the parlor stove to which it was his custom to attend, and Harry the fur rug. The poor were not forgotten, and the family were just as happy over their simple dinner as they had been the year before with turkey and fruit cake.

This bright incident shows that a great deal of happiness can be had by making the best of things, doesn't it?

Now's the time to be thinking up our New Year motto. Let it be a good one and just suited to our need. The Good Book is full of the choicest and most helpful thoughts. Choose one and tell Cozy Cornerers what it is (and why you have chosen it, too, if you like).

Affectionately,

NEPHEWS AND NIECES.

I wish to tell the Cozy Corner girls and boys about a very lovely little book I have read, by Kate Douglas Wiggin, called "The Birds' Christmas Carol." It is the story of a little invalid named Carol Bird, who was born on Christmas day, as the choir in a church near by were singing, "Carol, brothers, Carol." On her twelfth birthday, after making that Christmas a very merry one for a poor family in which she was interested, she went to heaven while the choir were singing, "Carol, brothers, Carol." The lesson I drew from the book was, be loving and generous, pure and sweet. DELIGHT MELLOWSWEET.

Thomaston, Me.

Here's another good suggestion for nephews and nieces. We have all enjoyed hearing Delight's ideas about this beautiful Christmas story and would like to hear from others of our circle about the books they have read.

My brother and I joined the L. T. L. five years ago, but we do not have regular meetings now. I am ten years old and my brother twelve, and I have a little sister two and-a-half years old. When she saw it snowing a few days ago she said, "Oh, mamma! it is snowing all over your pretty garden; you will have to go out and see about it!" JULIA MABEL DOROTHY.

St. Croix Falls, Wis.

What a cunning little sister yours must be. By the way, will not other Cozy Cornerers tell us of the cute sayings and doings of the little ones in their homes?

I would like to become a member of the Cozy Corner, if you will admit me. All of our family are temperance and my oldest sister is a member of the Y. W. C. T. U. I would be very glad to receive a letter from some of the nieces. Yours, LOUIE ROWLAND.

And still they come! Just clasp hands with the temperance boys and girls nearest you, little niece, and here you are.

CHRIST-COMMUNION.

It is well in these busy days of preparation for holiday festivities to keep in mind—as the children say—"what Christmas is for." In the primitive meaning of the word—that of Christ-communion—there is a beautiful suggestion of the true significance of Christmas-tide, and as our thoughts turn inward and upward we are filled with the consciousness that these "holidays" are truly "holy" days.

The birthday of our Lord is preëminently a holy day because it brought to man that by which he becomes whole—saved from himself, sound in body, soul and spirit. God's Christmas gift to the world He "so loved" is a salvation not only free but full. It does not mean merely the future escape of the soul from the bondage of earth to a far-off heaven. It means freedom in the life that now is—the harmonious coöperation of all the forces of being, beginning with the innermost and working to the outermost parts of creation. It means the will of God done on earth as it is in heaven. In a word, the incarnation is a proclamation of peace.

The Father does not force acceptance of His gift; neither is He indifferent concerning its reception or rejection. Knowing as we never can know its unspeakable value—knowing all that it brings to man—He so leads and disciplines His children that they may realize their need of the gift and come to desire it. Love, that same mighty force which wrought in the giving, operates in the hearts of men to impel the accepting.

And the Christ-child quickened into incarnate being nearly nineteen centuries ago, how it has grown and waxed strong and increased in wisdom and stature and in favor with God and man! From time to time amid the strife and turmoil of earthly existence, amid the clash and din of life's battle-field, some poet or seer upon the heights catches a glimpse of a fulness of stature, of man in Christ perfected, and, though the veil is yet between, that which he sees is unutterable. And it is well it is so. The world is prone to scoff at things it does not understand, and we know that as each heart opens to receive the beatific vision it sees it for itself.

Many people, while recognizing the upward tendency of the human race, are slow to attribute it to the influence of the Christ-spirit. The world, however, is learning by painful experience the divine philosophy of gospel teachings. In these days a great fundamental truth is being forcibly impressed upon the mind of man, viz., that we are all members of one body; that "if one member suffer all members suffer with it," and that to minister to the least of these is to minister to Christ, "whose body ye are." The growing spirit of helpfulness manifested along the various lines of philanthropy and reform indicates that consciously or unconsciously men are "coming nearer"—coming into closer Christ-communion.

And what can we who have received so much give to God? All things are already His. "The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof, the world and they that dwell therein." Then can we not even give ourselves? "There is always a considerable quantity of pride," says Ruskin, "in what is called 'giving oneself to God,' as if one had ever belonged to any one else!" But we can give Him obedience. We can do the one thing He asks of us—recognize Him as our life and acknowledge our dependence upon Him. And the recognition of God as the universal Father includes the recognition of all men as brothers and brings us into closer fellowship with each other and with Christ, who is in all.

The Christmas season, then, is not only a commemoration but a prophecy. The custom of gift-giving—which, as a custom, tends to kindliness and good will among men—prefigures the day when the Christ-spirit shall spread over the entire earth, when peace shall reign the world over, when nations and individuals shall no longer say "mine" and "thine," but "ours in Christ Jesus."

A MARTYR OF TO-DAY.

Municipal misrule has had no nobler martyr in these days of danger to the patriot than Robert Ross, of Troy, N. Y. Pure politics was the ideal that this brave youth had set before his mind and heart. His life and his untimely death have taught that a man can be a thoroughly good Christian and at the same time a good citizen, and furthermore, that he cannot be a good citizen without being a Christian. The ancestry and training of Robert Ross led naturally up to the heroic position taken by him as a Christian patriot. He was of Highland blood; the clan of Ross represents the best Scottish history. There is no more sturdy national character than that of the Scotch race.

The father and mother of Robert trained him in practical Christianity. The Presbyterian Sabbath-school extended that thorough knowledge of the Bible as the great rule of human life and duty which was wrought into the fibre of his thinking. He was educated in the public schools, and as a young business man came in contact with the varied nationalities that make up the population of our large cities. Robert was an athlete physically; he was six feet, two and one-half inches in height and weighed two hundred pounds. He led in all reputable sports, but was so kindly and helpful that he was always ready to mortgage his great physical strength in the interest of the weaker. Cowardice was wholly foreign to his nature.

On election day he went with his brothers to the polls, for they were not intimidated by the bravado and criminality of the roughs who were out in force to prevent reputable men from casting their ballots. It has been well said that boss rule means the seizure of municipal control by selfish and illiterate men whose main support comes from the saloons, the gamblers and haunts of vice. Robert Ross stood in his place as a loyal young citizen helping to protect the honesty and purity of the ballot. Had he shirked this duty he would not have lost his life in the heyday of his youth; but he had been accustomed to go to the caucus and the primary meeting; he regarded it as a part of his Christian duty to do so. He was a member of a Christian Endeavor Society and to the everlasting credit of that great association let it be remembered that its first martyr died in the cause of a clean ballot and pure politics. Repeating is the method of the traitor in politics and Robert Ross stood as the champion of one ballot for each voter, quietly cast and honestly counted. Those who shot him represented the exact opposite of this view of the voter's privilege. Bat Shea, the man who shot Robert Ross, is a typical character. He is one who "stands in" with the men who make their living by conducting one or the other of the three dens that lurk along our city streets, the dramshop, the gambling house, the haunt of shame. Troy is a typical American city, and when Robert Ross went forth to do his solemn duty on March 6, 1894, he was a typical Christian citizen. If others reared as he was had been equally devoted their overwhelming numbers at the polls would have made the bully that killed him shrink away, for such as he can understand the force of numbers but not the power of principles. As an example to the flock we wish that the life of Robert Ross, written by Rev. James H. Ross, of Boston, and published by James H. Earle, of that city, might be in every Sunday-school library throughout the nation as an incentive to the rising young manhood of our homes and of the church of Christ to stand in its lot and place, "And, having done all, to stand" for the coming of Christ, not only in the customs of society, but in the laws of the land.

THE BATTLE IS THE LORD'S.

The action of social purity workers in exposing the vicious character of certain places of amusement has, besides drawing out severe criticism from the newspapers (which was to be expected), called forth not a little unfriendly comment among people who are honestly desirous of seeing these evils abolished. It is urged by many that the methods employed are more likely to augment than to suppress the wickedness of a large city; that by directing public attention to the immoral exhibitions of certain theatres, these particular places are getting a good deal of free advertising and the attendance upon their performances thereby greatly increased.

To those who have already started an investigation of such evils, this discussion of methods is one of deep and pertinent interest. And that it is a question of methods alone no one will dispute—for there can exist no doubt concerning the righteousness and the necessity of the movement itself.

We realize, as do all who are planning these attacks in the interests of the purity of society and of the home, that it is a warfare which calls for the wisest generalship and the most judicious tactics; that it is a work which demands of its leaders the wisdom of serpents and the harmlessness of doves. While disclosing the evil practices of certain theatres for the purpose of arousing public indignation and creating a general demand for their abolishment, crusaders must at the same time avoid giving unnecessary publicity to their location and other details which tend to advertise and recommend them to the viciously inclined.

But however averse we may be to drawing the attention of the low-minded and unchaste to the "attractions" of immoral places of amusement, it is from the nature of the work—involving, as it often does, public prosecution—obviously impossible to suppress all information as to their whereabouts. Even if the stirring up of this offensive plague spot in our body social should seem for the time to make matters worse; even if it should, as is asserted, result in an increase of patronage for these places and apparently greater activity for the powers of evil, we may find encouragement in the assurance that it is but the manifestation of that aggravated phase of the disease which often follows the application of an effective remedy and precedes that more healthy condition which indicates a cleansing of the parts from the leprous taint. It is but an exhibition of the conquered and angry demon's power before he leaves his victim forever at the bidding of the Master.

But let us see what the managers and proprietors of these theatres themselves have to say concerning the "results" of this onslaught upon their business—for we may judge largely of the wisdom of reform methods by noting the attitude of the attacked toward the reformers. If in the opinion of these, the most interested parties, this agitation will increase the popularity of their vile exhibitions and thus help to swell their bank accounts, we may expect to find them hailing the movement with delight. But what are the facts? We find them organizing for "protection" against all attack which it is declared is helpful to their business! In London the managers of theatres and music halls have formed an Amusement Protection Association, the object of which is to uphold the principle that the recreation of the people shall not be controlled by that which they term "effete puritanism and bigotry," and a paper is to be published to further the aims of the society.

Now in view of this fighting attitude on the part of the promoters and patrons of indecent performances it is safe to conclude that the methods of the crusaders are not far wrong, and that there is really little to fear from "increased popularity." The case is analogous to that of the saloon and prohibition. The liquor men declare loudly that "prohibition doesn't prohibit," and that "more liquor is sold in prohibition than licensed localities," yet when it comes to putting forth any effort to secure prohibitory law (claimed to be so stimulating to the drink traffic) we find them working desperately to defeat it.

When our antagonist winces we know he is wounded, and as long as the theaters continue to "show fight" and to muster their forces for defensive action, the reformers may take courage and go forward, knowing that the result will be a battle gained for God and purity and a step upward for mankind.

As has been said, this cleansing of our places of amusement from "living pictures" and other immoral features is woman's work, and none but God-guided, consecrated women could, would or should undertake their investigation and exposure. Such women are endowed with a wisdom which is not of man. They ask of God and He giveth liberally. For it is His work, they are His co-laborers, and we know that the great Leader himself will take care of results.

CALL FOR THE THIRD BIENNIAL CONVENTION OF THE WORLD'S WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.

THE W. C. T. U. TEMPLE,
CHICAGO, Jan. 1, 1895.

To the White Ribbon Women in Every Land:

BELOVED COMRADES:—The Women's Temperance Crusade has progressed beyond our fondest hopes; it is now a matter of fact that in no large city or town on the globe will the traveler fail to find a group of wives and mothers united in a systematic effort to conserve all that is highest and most holy in the home, and to diminish the power of those malign forces that threaten its perpetuity and peace. The Polyglot Petition has already wrought its most helpful work by serving as a bond of unity among these widely severed circles. It has carried the arrest of thought to uncounted millions of well disposed men and women, and its earnest plea for the abolition of the liquor traffic, the opium trade, and the traffic in the purity of the mother-sex, has penetrated the thought, affections and purposes of a larger number of human beings scattered over a wider area than has ever been wrought by any single effort heretofore put forth by women. The preventive, educational, evangelistic, social and legal work involved in the "do-everything" policy of the white ribbon movement is understood and practiced by all these groups, which include not fewer than half a million members in all parts of the world. In this enumeration we count the active members who are women, the honorary members who are men, and the army of young people and children who march behind the banner inscribed, "For God and Home and Every Land."

The fact that this movement stands for no sectarianism in religion, and is formed to conserve the interests of the masses rather than of the classes, has endeared it alike to Protestant and Catholic and to wage-workers as well as women everywhere. The noontide hour of prayer has now been adopted by many great societies of religious and philanthropic workers as a time of united gratitude and spiritual uplift, by means of which not only is a channel opened for the incoming of the divine power but the hearts of the workers are drawn toward each other in unity of aspiration. Thoughts and things and prayers are purposes. The invisible is the only real world. The powers that be are the powers unseen; the harmonization of the world in which we seem to dwell is only possible as our spirits become attuned to the angelic song of "Peace on earth, good will to men" in the real world of which Christ said, "If it were not so I would have told you." In this spirit and in defense of these principles, we call on any and all who feel "the tie that binds our hearts in Christian love" to meet with us in London, "the heart of the world," on June 14-21 in Queen's Hall and Exeter Hall, that we may concert measures that will, by the blessing of God, give a stronger impetus than any heretofore realized for the working out of home protection in the customs, the laws and the politics of the lands in which we live.

Article VII of our constitution reads:

The biennial meeting shall be composed of the executive committee, National secretaries and treasurers, the World's superintendents of departments, the editors and publisher of the official organ and one delegate from every one thousand members of affiliated National unions.

The British Women's Temperance Association will hold its meetings contemporaneously with our own, and all philanthropic societies sympathetically inclined toward the principles we represent are warmly invited to send fraternal delegates.

On Friday, June 14, at Memorial Hall, Farringdon St., London, the executive committee of the National B. W. T. A. will hold its first session, and on Saturday, June 15, the executive of the World's W. C. T. U. will meet. On Sunday, June 16, a prominent preacher will be secured for a morning service at Exeter Hall, and a women's meeting, with none but women speakers, will be held in the afternoon, these Sunday services to be participated in jointly by the World's W. C. T. U. and the National B. W. T. A. On June 17 and 18 (Monday and Tuesday) will be held the all-day session of the B. W. T. A. council, and on Wednesday, the 19th, the all-day convention of the World's W. C. T. U. To this meeting on the 19th we especially urge all temperance, women's, purity and labor organizations to send fraternal delegates. On Thursday, the 20th, the executive of the National B. W. T. A. will hold its final session, and on Friday, the 21st, the World's W. C. T. U. will meet in executive committee.

The annual meeting of the British Women's Temperance Association will be presided over by its president, Lady Henry Somerset, and Miss Frances E. Willard will preside at all sessions of the World's W. C. T. U. convention. The leading temperance speakers of England and America will be on the program, and distinguished leaders from the Woman's Christian Temperance Unions of Canada, Australasia, South Africa, India, China, Japan and the Hawaiian Republic will be represented; also those of Scandinavia and many other European countries.

That we may realize that "preparation of the heart" which is from God alone, we ask all the home people who have cast in their lot with us to meet in their local unions on Saturday, May 18, and observe the Day of Prayer, holding an afternoon prayer-meeting and evening mass-meeting, and if possible arranging for a union Sunday service on the following day, May 19; or if this cannot be brought about, a sermon from each pastor who will help us by preaching on woman's work for the protection of the home.

And now may each and every one of us be able to say in the power of the spirit, "the Lord hath not given me the spirit of fear but of power and of love and of a sound mind."

Your true yoke-fellows,

FRANCES E. WILLARD, President.
ISABEL SOMERSET, Vice-president-at-Large.
ANNA A. GORDON, Assistant Secretary.
ELLA F. M. WILLIAMS, Treasurer.

Rev. Dr. Henry S. Lunn, 5 Endsleigh Gardens, London, has made arrangements to convey delegates to the World's W. C. T. U. convention from New York city to London; giving them a week in that city, also one week at Geneva, Switzerland, during the session of the Grindelwald conference, three days in Lucerne and in Paris, with return ticket to New York at any time desired, and board during the time mentioned at specified hotels, at a cost of two hundred dollars ($200) for the entire trip.

A CHRISTMAS RECOMMENDATION.

Our editor-in-chief wishes us to mention that the executive committee adopted her suggestion concerning Christmas presents, and for this reason she feels it incumbent upon her to mention that she hopes we shall all heed the mild admonition, and this year, at least, and, perhaps, all years, help those who need it most. In following out the idea Miss Willard will not send out her usual New Year card, but will write a New Year letter for our columns. We quote the action of the executive committee, which was an indorsement of the following:

"Of all the anachronisms that burden social life this thing of present making is perhaps the worst. It is not the biggest, but often a gnat torments hardly less than a fly, and nagging wearies worse than a stand-up fight. The trouble is we have outworn the simple ways when children only expected something, and that but a little "something," at the great festival, so now we try to give to all our circle, and oftentimes it is so large that we leave out those on whom we might have conferred the most happiness and give to those who give to us.

"Happily, there is a tendency to brush aside the whole performance, as we have finished with St. Valentine's day and New Year calls. If a few who are looked to as the foremost in fashion-making would announce their intention to give only to those who really needed a helping hand, we should hail the plan as a glad note of deliverance. Why cannot white-ribboners send forth this declaration and appeal? Why cannot this Convention set a keynote of its own, at least for that great group of homes with which we are related in bonds of mutual love and trust? Why cannot we all agree with one another that the coming holidays we will send no token except to those whom we can help to better conditions of everyday life by means of better food, clothes, shelter, furniture, adornments for the walls of their homes, happy thoughts to enliven and enrich their minds? I feel sure we shall be glad to try this for one holiday week at least, and if it works well (as it is sure to do, for he is twice blessed who gives instead of gets) then the custom may easily become rooted among us and spread to those whom we can influence."

DEAR ON DUTY:—Would you like to have the following true incident for your Watch Tower?

"Be ye kindly affectionate one toward another."

I have been the recipient of many kind acts, even from strangers—let me note one. Starting early one morning to go shopping, although the day was cloudy, I neglected to carry an umbrella. After making my purchases I found it was raining and blowing. I stepped into a doorway to securely fasten my coat and reflect upon the situation. Many pedestrians glanced at me, and walked on. As I was about desperately starting to face the storm a sweet looking young woman stepped up, saying, "Madam, will you kindly share my umbrella?" Gladly I accepted. When we reached the street where I must turn to take my car I thanked her for the kindness, and protested against her going out of her way for a stranger; "But," she exclaimed, "I must see you to the car. My home is in Chicago, and once when I was in your predicament a bright little Irish woman asked in a witty way to share her umbrella with me; I, like yourself, was very grateful and thanked her for going out of her way for me; she replied, 'I will ask you in return to do the same when opportunity offers,' and now I have found you." Should the Chicago lady read this in your columns, I want her to know I, too, have helped a little with my umbrella. I do not know of any act, great or small, that touched my heart more than the little kindness of this unknown woman. May kind acts be passed along the line, blessing the giver, and making life better and brighter to the receiver.

Sincerely yours, LILLIE CORNELL MILLER.

It seems almost incredible that young men students in Columbia College should have carried skirt dancing to such an extreme that President Seth Low has been obliged to make a rule against it. It is stated in a New York paper that one of the young men recently ordered a costume feminine in all its details from hose to dress; the finest linen was employed and the student's monogram and crest were worked upon every single article of attire. Strange to say, these garments were on exhibition in a dressmaker's room on Fifth Avenue for several weeks before the young man in full regalia and paint and powder gave his dance in public. It is stated that the same idiotic fad is in full favor among the students of Harvard University. Extremes like these exhibitions and the scenes of misery in the slums of Boston, New York and Chicago, denote an approaching crisis in our civilization —one which we do not believe can be successfully passed without the active coöperation of women in public affairs.

Apropos of this idea, we are much interested in the fact that while Mrs. Lowell is bestirring herself among the "400" of New York City, Mrs. Brick Pomeroy is equally active at the other end of the social scale. She is enlisting wage-working women to secure votes for the reform candidate for mayor, and has set about her work in the following ingenious fashion: She forms what she calls a "liberty link," including perhaps a dozen of these young women, each of whom is pledged to win a certain number of votes, circulating literature, arguments, etc., for that purpose, and she then combines these links in larger societies and assemblies, where they lengthen to chains of public sentiment that shall bind only the tiger of Tammany, leaving all decent people free.

Our embassador to England paid the following tribute to English homelife which we are glad to reproduce in these cosmopolitan columns, that it may go to the ends of the earth and carry with it into half a million white ribbon homes a deepened impression of that sweet old saying,

"Though sundered far, by faith we meet Around one common mercy seat."

This is what the embassador said in speaking to his fellow citizens on his return from England a few days ago: "I could tell you of other experiences somewhat of a varied character, tasting of the delights of a genial and refined h spitality. I have never passed a night in any house in England in which that family did not kneel every morning in common prayer to the Ruler of the world. Everywhere it is done. It is not done ostentatiously, but is done by the hearts of the people, and it is almost their universal practice. I have been a long time there and I do not remember that I have heard any oath. I am sure I have never heard at any entertainment in the height of jest, a story that a man would object to telling his wife, his sister or his daughter." ON DUTY.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA.

IN THIRD ANNUAL CONVENTION.

The third annual convention of the W. C. T. U. in Western Australia was held in the Perth town hall, September 1 to 5, and was on every hand pronounced a decided success.

Saturday evening's program consisted of a miscellaneous concert ably presided over by the chief justice of Western Australia, Mr. A. C. Onslow. The Judge assured the members of the W. C. T. U. of his sympathy with their work, and remarked that from his judicial experience, he found that drink was the cause, directly or indirectly, of most of the crimes that came under his notice. The meeting concluded with a dialogue in character, entitled the "Congress of Nations," by several ladies representing the different nationalities.

On Sunday evening after the closing of the different churches divine service was held in the hall, when Miss A. L. A. Murcutt, the Australasian organizer, gave an earnest and thoughtful address.

Monday evening was devoted to temperance when all the temperance organizations of Perth united with the W. C. T. U. in a procession which was considered the largest of the kind ever held in Perth, and which paraded the principal streets for fully an hour before the time appointed for the meeting. The chair was taken by Mr. Mosely, a great temperance advocate, and several addresses were given, interspersed with vocal and instrumental music. Much enthusiasm was evinced during the whole of the proceedings.

Wednesday evening a lecture, "The Rise and Growth of the W. C. T. U.," presided over by Lady Forrest (wife of the premier of Western Australia, Sir John Forrest) was given by Miss A. L. A. Murcutt. The lecture was illustrated by lime-light views, and should be the means of spreading the knowledge of the work, as the talented lecturer gave a very lucid and concise account of the organization. The day sessions were fairly well attended and were presided over by Mrs. Hamlin, Colonial superintendent of prison work in the absence of the Australasian president, who through stress of work in her own colony was unable to attend.

No doubt the signal success of the convention was due mainly to the earnest and heartfelt prayers with which the assembly opened, and this spirit of prayer and unity extended throughout the proceedings. The Colonial corresponding secretary, Miss F. J. A. Murcutt, presented her report for the year, which showed that the union numbered four hundred members, and that the sum of £400 had been raised to carry on the work throughout the colony. During the year four hundred and forty-one meetings had been held, and much good had been the result. The departments of work, such as flower mission, prison work, sailors' work, literature, juvenile, etc., had all been taken up by the local unions, and carried out in a conscientious manner.

The reports from the local unions were very satisfactory, showing an increase of membership, more interest in the work and more zeal in furthering the cause of temperance. Greetings were received from all the colonies, and one in particular from the Australasian president, Mrs. Nicholls, assuring the members of her love and sympathy, and regret at being unable to attend, and asking for their loyalty and help in the work in which she is engaged. A resolution was passed to that effect, and sent to Mrs. Nicholls. Great regret was expressed at the resignation of the Colonial secretaries, the Misses Murcutt, who were leaving the colony, and a special vote of thanks was accorded them for the work they had accomplished during the year, which was feelingly responded to by these ladies. The members trust that with the Colonial president, Mrs. Hensman's (wife of Judge Hensman) help, who last year was touring Europe, they may this year do good work for God and Home and Humanity.

CAPE COLONY'S CONVENTION.

The W. C. T. U. of Cape Colony held its fifth annual convention during the last days of September in Cape Town. Conventions are always good, but the attendants at this were unanimous in declaring this to have been the best we have yet held.

The keynote was struck by the Rev. W. Searle, who ably filled his wife's place in the annual sermon. His text, Acts 10:38; the thought, the anointing "with the Holy Ghost and with power," needed if we wished, as followers of Christ, to continue His work. The thought was emphasized in the devotional hour with which the convention began, the Bible reading being Isa. 40:28, 31. Power from God to do the work before us was asked for and received.

The report of the secretary was a most encouraging one. It told of the increase in membership—300 new members this year—of work done for the homeless, the sick, the lost, of evangelistic work, Demorest contests, etc. The treasurer reported a balance on the right side. The superintendent of Y work reported four new unions, two in the colony, one in the Free State and one in the Transvaal. The reports of all the superintendents were cheering. While they told of difficulties met, they also told of how they were overcome.

The report of our organizer, Miss Alice R. Palmer, was a chapter which we shall all like to see in the new Acts of the Apostles. While listening to her we felt that we could only thank God and the World's W. C. T. U. for having loaned her to us for a season. It was with sincere regret that we learned her decision to leave us at Christmas, on her homeward way. We pray that God's blessing may accompany her future work as it has all her work since she landed on our shores.

The election of officers left the executive nearly unchanged, nearly all of the officers being reëlected. Mrs. C. D. Roberts, of Grahamstown, is now superintendent of the evangelistic department, Mrs. E. J. Geard, of Port Elizabeth, superintendent of literature, and Mrs. W. Macintosh, of Port Elizabeth, of scientific instruction.

The convention lasted three days and the feeling of all members seemed to be that "it was good for us to be there." That the spirit of the convention is still working is manifest in the fact that three new unions have been organized since its close.

"LABORS ABUNDANT."

We are climbing along up the heights, carrying our glorious "banner with the strange device," "For God and Home and Humanity," and as we go radiant visions are sometimes given to us of what our lovely world would be if all were working under the same banner, woman enfranchised, childhood encircled with love, and men "the brothers of women." Ah, but with what painful toil and sacrifice is this to be wrought! and with what patience must we wait as well as labor. It is of labors abundant I have to write, as our sixth annual Colonial convention has just closed its sessions, and the year has been one of earnest endeavor and much success.

The twenty-six reports of departments showed that a large amount of effort had been put forth, and considerable advance made by superintendents in acquaintance with methods of work. We start the new year with firmer convictions of the grandeur of our cause and a wider conception of its scope and meaning. Our convention was educative to those who "belong," and a substantial object lesson also to the outsiders. Our business sessions were held in Pirie Street Wesleyan Church and the evening meetings in the Adelaide Town Hall. The first topical meeting was on the suffrage question, and was championed by our radiant member of the legislative council, Dr. Magarey. The bill for adult suffrage, which passed the upper House weeks ago, has been arrested in its progress to the lower House, and its fate is yet uncertain. Some sanguine souls are sure it will pass, but others are doubtful, realizing that there are many sinuosities in the way of the political "heathen Chinee." I am glad to say that women are arousing themselves to the need of preparing for their possible responsibilities, so that they may use their power intelligently when they get it. The Suffrage League of South Australia recently sent in a petition with eleven thousand signatures, eight thousand of which were secured by W. C. T. U. workers, who met with many amusing incidents and much illogical reasoning in the course of their campaign.

We had some very plain talk for prohibition and social purity; our always reliable friend, Rev. Joseph Berry, of Pirie Street Church, speaking to us on the latter subject. Mrs. Harrison Lee, the Victorian Alliance lecturer, who held a mission in connection with our convention, gave a very earnest address on the same subject. Our president's (Mrs. Nicholls) annual address was a masterly piece of literature, some profoundly wise oracle declaring that "a woman couldn't have written it!"

Mrs. Edwards, one of our district presidents, gave an able and instructive paper on "Opium." We do desire most intensely to save our beautiful South Australia from that awful vice.

The ballots returned us the same Colonial officers. Opportunity was taken to express the gratification of the convention at the election of our Colonial president, Mrs. Nicholls, as Australasian president, and also to rejoice at the prospect of a visit from our beloved World's president, Miss Willard, accompanied by Lady Henry Somerset, and bringing the Great Petition. We did not forget our honorary president, Miss Ackermann, and day by day, as that noontide hour came, our thoughts found vent in tender, loving prayers to the great Head of all good works.

The South Australian press has very copiously reported this convention, and thus the attention of the public has been called to our work. Of course, there is some adverse criticism, but we can stand that, and it is probably better for us than too much patting on the back. The white ribbon has come to be understood as a reflection upon the tippling church member as well as a direct affront to the liquor dealer, and we expect no placability from either; they are quite likely to voice their grievance on every opportunity. But we want the sober to join us; we want every total abstinence woman to put on the badge of our sisterhood, and then united, the world's white-ribboned armies shall fight the battle for Prohibition along with our brothers, and men shall be made "sober by act of Parliament." NEW SOUTH WALES.

ANNUAL CONVENTION.

The twelfth annual convention of the above was held in Sydney, September 25 to 29, 1894, and was in every respect the best Colonial convention yet held here. The number of delegates present was ninety-three, representing a fair proportion of our unions.

Mrs. Nolan, our beloved and honored Colonial president, in her address, gave a grateful review of the year's achievements. The reports of the secretaries revealed signs of decided progress among the unions, and a steady growth of sentiment. There are now 49 unions, with a total membership of 1,876, being an increase of 12 unions and 401 members. There are also 100 honorary members. The Y unions number 10, with a membership of 264 and 52 honoraries, thus bringing up the total membership to 2,140 and 152 honoraries. The public meetings held during the year have been 169, besides a much larger number of social and home meetings. Four unions have Bands of Hope, and three have Loyal Temperance Legions under their care. Two unions have coffee rooms entirely under their own control, and two have built cabmen's shelters, which are much appreciated by the men. Our official organ, The White Ribbon Signal, received hearty support from the majority of the unions; many also subscribed to THE UNION SIGNAL. Twenty-seven unions supply temperance items to the press. The work in connection with the proposed Inebriate Home is progressing well. The amount raised for general W. C. T. U. work was £370.

Reports of Colonial superintendents were, in most cases, of an encouraging nature, though most superintendents had to complain of the negligence of local unions in the matter of reporting. Very few if any superintendents received replies from more than twenty-eight out of the forty-seven unions, and many received much fewer. Very distinct advance is observable in woman's franchise, juvenile work, literature, influencing the press, drawing-room and college meetings and scientific instruction. Social purity is having to make its way step by step, many unions fighting shy of the subject, but our capable superintendent is not easily discouraged. The superintendent for grocer's licenses has not met with the success which her energy merited, only six unions having responded to her appeal. One of these obtained one hundred signatures to a petition, and another induced a grocer to forego his license, so labor has not been altogether fruitless. Several very excellent papers were read during the convention, many of them being first attempts so far as our work is concerned. The subjects taken were: "Literature," Miss Pemell; "Alcohol and Science," Miss Hartshorne; "Social Purity," Mrs. Wilson; "Personal Responsibility," Mrs. Webb; "L. T. L. Work," Miss Russell; "Special Y Work," Miss Henry; and "Headquarters for New South Wales," by Mrs. Masterman. The latter paper met with a hearty reception, and as the outcome of the discussion it was decided to take immediate steps to secure a building, several delegates promising the support and coöperation of their unions. The other papers all contained valuable information and practical suggestions.

A Y conference was held one evening which proved helpful and instructive. A number of girls took part. There was also a conference on social purity, led by the superintendent, Mrs. Wilson, who stated that in Sydney alone there are two thousand outcast women and that in the same city twelve hundred illegitimate children are born every year. In connection with this subject it was resolved that a letter prepared by the Australian executive in re raising the age of consent to eighteen, be signed by our Colonial officers and presented at an early date to the legislative assembly of New South Wales.

It was resolved to send a letter prepared by the president to all medical men, in which six questions were asked and answers requested. The questions bore on the relation of the use of alcohol to disease, insanity and crime. Dr. Singleton, of Melbourne, seeing these questions in the daily papers, attended one of the sittings and gave a large amount of very valuable information.

The session closed in an impressive scene, all the delegates joining hands round the hall and singing, "God be with you till we meet again." I may add, that on the Saturday afternoon there was a harbor excursion in connection with the franchise department which was very successful. A landing was made at Garden Island where a meeting was held and enthusiastic speeches made in favor of this movement. MRS. EMILY M. PRICE.

OUR NORTHERN NORWAY.

It has been my good lot to assist at the second annual meeting of the Norwegian Women's Temperance Association (affiliated to the W. W. C. T. U.) which took place September 4 till 6, in Christiania, the capital of Norway, (a town of some one hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants, which in the last years has been and is still growing much more rapidly than we are used to see in the old European countries).

Imagine my joy in seeing real progressive steps being taken by Norwegian women! Certainly, they have had their struggles and their difficulties, but they found the rapid growth of their association during the last year wonderful and most unexpected. A year ago at the first annual meeting, five delegates were present besides the executive committee, and this time nearly thirty delegates represented eighteen branches with one thousand and ninety-four adult members. In the course of the year a society for children has been started, which now numbers eighty-eight members. To tell in detail of all the first steps taken on your own well-known lines would be quite out of place; but I beg you to remember that all this work is new in our countries, where women have still to fight all the old customs and prejudice if they want to do some public work. And we Christian women have to brave the blame and condemnation of the clergymen, who wish that the women shall work in silence. But some of us have made the discovery that Christ certainly intended to set us free, and we therefore venture to perform our work in His name, trusting that He himself will lead us on.

It was, indeed, a remarkable event that a minister of the Norwegian church opened the series of women's meetings held at the University of Christiania, presided over and conducted entirely by women. The executive committee dared not hope that the University would grant a hall to be used by women, but God wonderfully heard their prayers and helped their efforts.

The Norwegian sisters just now have begun to see that the men are really not capable of helping the world to be better by drawing redeemed humanity nearer to Christ quite alone, without the help of loving women who have studied the science of "organized motherhood."

It was very encouraging to assist at the business meetings, at the festival dinner in a charming mountain place and at the public evening meeting, where two younger Norwegian ministers—with the white ribbon on their coat—gave lectures on Christian temperance work, while your lecturer and organizer for Norway ended by telling of American and English work personified in our president, Frances Willard, and our vice-president, Lady Henry Somerset. This meeting was crowded, and the business meetings every day gathered an audience essentially made up by ladies, while also some gentlemen appeared.

Every day at noon the business was interrupted by prayer for our world-wide organization, its leaders and its progress everywhere, especially in Denmark, that was represented by three members of the small Danish W. C. T. U. The three following days we were taking part in a Scandinavian purity congress.

WORLD'S WAVE CRESTS.

NEW SOUTH WALES has thirty-one departments of work, with an active superintendent for each.

HAVE you noticed how the convention reports on our World's page breathe the spirit of progress and enthusiasm in our world-wide work?

THE organizing department of the British Women's Temperance Association, of which Miss Helen Hood is head, has made it a rule not to form a union unless fifteen members join.

BY our South African report, it will be learned that Miss Alice R. Palmer, fifth round-the-world missionary, starts for home at Christmas-tide, for a season of rest after her absence of nearly three years.

THE president of the W. C. T. U. of India, Mrs. Mary R. Phillips, has ordered a complete set of scientific temperance text books, and intimates that she has found a special opportunity to introduce them. We await further information.

THE W. C. T. U. of Cawnpore, India, organized November, 1892, by Miss Ackermann, is maintaining by a faithful few its interest in temperance. Literature, work among young men, flower mission and juvenile work are its special labors. A Hindustan branch was organized last July, which numbers twenty-two earnest members. This branch has a mercy and help department, with a native deaconess at its head.

THE World's Petition has lost a brave helper in the recent death of Mrs. Lois E. Trott, who was for fifteen years president of Mt. Vernon, N. Y., union. Though advanced in years this remarkable woman personally secured one thousand five hundred names for the Polyglot Petition, herself walking the streets from door to door to accomplish this great result. If we had one woman like her in each country what a petition that would grow to be.

MRS. ELISABET SELMER, in company with the vice-president of the Copenhagen W. C. T. U., has presented to the government an address signed with more than 103,000 Danish women's names, in which they ask, first, for the prohibition of the sale of liquor from Saturday evening until Monday morning. Second, the separation of the sale of liquor from all other merchandise, and the third, for local option. This petition was prepared and worked up by the Danish W. C. T. U. Other temperance societies in that country are following this idea and are now gathering signatures among men. Mrs. Selmer has just been on a lecture trip in Denmark and Northern Germany, and hopes soon to visit Sweden in the interest of the World's W. C. T. U.

REV. C. S. ADAMA VON SCHELTEMA, of Arnheim, Holland, writes that on October 9 the W. C. T. U. held its anniversary meeting at The Hague. The union, though small, is doing solid work, mostly among the young and the better class of people. On the 10th the National union met at Rotterdam, and it was the best yearly meeting they yet have had. Everything on the Continent grows at a slow pace, but in other countries and colonies we are marching forward. The missionaries in the East Indies begin to feel the necessity of our endeavors, and are doing a good work among the soldiers.

MRS. MARY R. PHILLIPS, president of India W. C. T. U., has just visited Madras, and finds earnest work going on in the W. C. T. U. and the Young Woman's Christian Association. The daily papers of Madras give them a column a week for temperance news. She has also visited a number of other stations lately, strengthening the old and forming new societies. At Poona she reports a very promising union just started. She dined with Pundita Ramabai and met her W. C. T. U., fifty-six strong, and says she has enjoyed nothing more in her India work than this meeting. The first convention of the W. C. T. U. ever held in India was called for December 8 to 10.

ACCORDING to the summary of the World's W. C. T. U. treasurer, Mrs. Ella F. M. Williams, of Montreal, Canada, the total receipts for the year were, dues, $1,628.60, and donations, $1,707.05. The disbursements leave a balance in treasury of $281.69. As might be expected, the United States leads in payment of dues, $1,290.90; Canada has second place with $95.52; Australasia, third, $66.55 and Great Britain fourth, $23.94. New Zealand sends $20.20; Africa, $12.37; Norway, $6.37; Chile, $2; Burma, $1.95; Denmark, $1.73; Bahama Islands, $1; Madagascar, 49 cents. The United States also contributes the largest sum in donations, $1.212.87; Canada gives $268.48; Great Britain, $195.80, and Australia, $19.50. [Since this report was issued $774 has been sent to the World's Treasurer by the treasurer of the United States.]

AN enthusiastic white-ribboner of the Sunrise Land writes the following interesting letter: "It was a few weeks ago that I received a letter with the signature of Miss Willard and a few other ladies, saying that you celebrate the one week of September 22 to 28, as the self-denial week. I was greatly pleased to hear of that and wanted to send my spared money soon. But I was then in a little town of Fukuyama in Hokkaido and could not find the way to send the money to foreign lands. However, I stopped at Hakodate a few days ago on my way to Tokio. There I asked the postmaster to send one dollar to you. Please receive it from your postoffice. I am very thankful that Miss Willard wrote to me and I will try to be an earnest temperance girl, and do good in His holy name. Please tell to Miss Willard if you shall meet her, that I came to Tokio a few days ago and will stay until the temperance crusaders would come to this land next year. I will try my best to open the way as wide as I can so that they may enter into many classes of people."

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

WORK OF THE W. C. T. U.

Since last you heard from us many pleasant things have taken place and some which are important to our work. After our delegates returned from Cleveland the district W. C. T. U. held a mass-meeting in the Vermont Avenue Christian church to listen to their reports and be enthused thereby. Our delegates, Mrs. Williams and Mrs. Bieler and our officers, Mrs. Shelton, Miss Weightman and Mrs. Wescott told us about the Convention in a most interesting and charming way.

There was a resolution passed in favor of one Sergeant Daily, a police officer who has been accused and tried, we think, because he was firm and fearless in prosecuting his sworn duty against the liquor interests of this city as represented by illegal saloons and brothels. We learn to-day that a triumph for good order has been achieved in the reinstatement of this officer, and that he is about to extend his operations by ferreting out violations of the United States law by those who sell without paying the tax imposed by it of twenty-five dollars a year above the license fee of four hundred dollars.

Preparations are already being made for the coming to this city of the Woman's Congress, February 18 to March 2. The various woman's clubs here have appointed committees of arrangement.

Our headquarters are in the building owned and conducted by the Central union mission, a benevolent institution. From that building there were sent out on Thanksgiving day to poor families nine hundred baskets, each containing a turkey and other good things to average a dinner for five persons. Besides this, five hundred persons were feasted at the tables spread in the building, making a modern miracle of "five thousand fed." The headquarters of the W. C. T. U. were thrown open and decorated with flags, and white-ribboners lent material aid in the good work.

Now that Congress is opened, the city is full of life and animation. The W. C. T. U. is prosecuting its various departments, and endeavoring to do its duty in the nation's capital.

WESTERN WASHINGTON.

LITTLE BY LITTLE.

Our great mountain sometimes called Mt. Rainier, sometimes Mt. Tacoma, is said to be in a state of active eruption. The W. C. T. U. of Western Washington are imitating its activity as far as we are able with the forces at hand. Would we had volcanic power to overturn the liquor traffic for all time, but little by little the power is accumulating, not always in the direct line of prohibition. Other forces are at work the ultimate end of which will help our cause along.

Some time ago there was held in the city of Tacoma, the northwest interstate temperance congress, our state president, Dr. Ella J. Fifield, acting as chairman. The committee on credentials reported one hundred delegates present from Washington and Oregon.

Among the notable figures in the convention was Miss Amanda M. Way, of Kansas. She read a paper on "Good Templary, its work in the past, and its present mission." She was one of the organizers and was for a long time president of the W. C. T. U. of Kansas. She was one of the organizers of the liquor crusade in Kansas in 1873 and has been a member of every temperance society organized in the United States. It is a matter of pride with Miss Way that she assisted in securing legislative prohibition in Kansas. At present she is supposed to be taking a year's vacation from active work. Mrs. Fitch B. Stacy, of Tacoma, gave a Bible reading.

Frances E. Willard union, of Tacoma, furnished some special music for the occasion. Among those who took an active part in the discussions of various subjects were Mrs. Helen Harford, of Salem, Ore., Miss Emma E. Page, of Olympia, Mrs. Mattie Graves, of Centralia, Wis. W. C. T. U. day addresses were made by Dr. Ella J. Fifield, Mrs. Helen Harford, Dr. Eva Osborne, of Tacoma, Emma Page, of Olympia. You ask were there no gentlemen present? Oh! yes; some of the brightest and best our Western country affords, and we are proud of them, but time and space forbids our reporting their long list of names, and excellent papers and discussions, but altogether the congress was a great help to us.

Brother Tatum, of Denver, Col., our Quaker friend, has given a number of excellent lectures in the state, also Brother Northcutt, a Christian evangelist. Mrs. Ada Unruh, of Oregon, has endeared herself to the white-ribboners of Western Washington, also Mrs. Dr. Cady and Mrs. Helen D. Harford.

Chehalis county held an interesting county convention at Satsop, state president Dr. Ella J. Fifield being present, as she has been at every county convention since her election last June.

A large delegation was met by the Satsop ladies, and conducted to a tastefully trimmed hall. The forenoon was occupied by the usual routine work, appointing of committees, etc. Mrs. Karr tendered her resignation as superintendent of franchise, and Mrs. Trask was appointed in her place. Dinner and supper were served in the hall. The address of welcome was given by Mrs. Fuller, the response by Mrs. France, of Hoquiam. Mrs. Trask read a paper on "The convention held at Chehalis." Mrs. Fifield was met at the train and escorted to the hall and received with the Chautauqua salute; the convention joined in singing, "We all belong." Excellent reports came in from all the unions.

Mrs. Brown, of Montesano, read a paper on "The Franchise" during the evening session, after which to the surprise and pleasure of all present the Satsop band gave some stirring music. Numerous papers on various subjects were listened to, also an address by Dr. Fifield, followed by vocal music by Rev. Jordan and wife; also by the Satsop quartette. At the close two little girls came on the stage, each bearing a basket and a silver sugar bowl, and speaking to each other told what they would do with the collection they would get, then passed through the audience, taking a collection and presenting it to the convention.

Next morning the subject of narcotics was taken up and discussed. Social purity, mothers' meetings and Sabbath observance were all discussed, noontide prayer was observed.

The resolutions committee brought in their report. At the close Mrs. Parish, president of the Satsop union, presented each delegate, officer and superintendent with a souvenir made by Mrs. White, daughter of Mrs. Trask.

Olympia, Thurston county, sends the following good report: The enthusiasm with which our county was organized last March has not yet spent itself as was evidenced by the strong rally on the Little Rock M. E. camp ground in August. The managers of the camp-meeting graciously gave us one day out of their ten for W. C. T. U. day and we decided to make it at once our semi-annual convention.

Through the contributions of various unions and the helpful hands of friends on the grounds, a pleasant booth was erected for white ribbon headquarters which was a great advantage throughout. The camp is beautiful for situation, and the W. C. T. U. is to be granted a permanent place on the program from year to year, so we are arranging for a lot all our own and are planning to "lengthen our cords and strengthen our stakes" another summer.

We had seven unions represented and greetings from two others newly organized. The reports were encouraging and indicated genuine zeal for practical work. Franchise, social purity, narcotics, mercy and Demorest contests are the five departments taken up by the county, and these are very systematically pushed in every local union.

The president, Emma E. Page, and her sister, Miss Mary L. Page, made a tour of the county, making a special plea for the moral education of the children, urging that it be made a point in the public schools since more children may be reached there than anywhere else. Thirty-six addresses were given to old and young and collections were taken for literature to be distributed in every school, county and town. The response of the people everywhere to this call was hearty, and great interest was manifested in the plan of work by the convention. A very fine paper upon the subject was read by Mrs. Mead, of Bucoda. The applause and the interesting discussion it elicited show that the time is ripe for the undertaking.

Our county superintendent of public instruction is in thorough sympathy with the movement, and invited our president to speak before the Thurston county Teachers' Institute, which she did, and found the teachers glad to coöperate with the W. C. T. U. along these lines, realizing that heart culture lightens their labor of discipline, and that character building is the one vital thing for every boy and girl.

Mrs. Spencer, of Centralia, state superintendent of mothers' meetings, gave an address that stirred her attentive audience to a determination to do better things for home.

We were fortunate enough to have with us our state president, Dr. Ella J. Fifield, who gave the first address in the afternoon. Her subject was "The Scope and Aims of the W. C. T. U." The ministers and leading church workers were greatly instructed by her clear exposition of this greatest of all woman movements.

A most fearless and practically helpful paper was read by our consecrated superintendent of social purity. It was an awakening to fathers and mothers and young people in that large gathering. In the evening Emma E. Page gave a lecture on "The Voiceless Four-fifths," an appeal for the ballot for woman.

The work of the entire convention was received with remarkable enthusiasm and interest by the good people of the encampment and the surrounding community, to most of which it was comparatively new, but the enthusiasm and interest culminated at the gold medal contest in the afternoon. The six young people did themselves great honor in the grace and finish of their address, but they won their hearers most of all with their heart earnestness. "Those boys and girls mean it," was the frequent comment, while Bishop Foster's and Dr. Hunter's arguments for the legal prohibition of the saloon carried weight with the gray-haired disciples of Wesley gathered there.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

LOGAN County, Oklahoma, fittingly celebrated Miss Willard's birthday by forming a county organization, the first in the territory.

IN the Sixteenth Illinois district, Miss Marie Brehm, president, there have been held ninety Demorest contests the past year.

REV. H. E. GURNEY, of Clinton, N. Y., has been holding a series of gospel temperance meetings in Stamford, N. Y. Through his efforts a Y. W. C. T. U. has been organized, with a large membership.

THE daughter of Mrs. Lucy Washington, a well known New York white-ribboner, was married at Philadelphia, November 15, to Rev. Robert S. J. Mitcheson.

MISS ELIZABETH U. YATES, who has much ability as an orator, will be one of the principal speakers at the National Suffrage meeting in Atlanta, Georgia, in February.

ARMSTRONG county, Pa., held its annual convention at Apollo. Dr. Anna Shaw gave the address, and a gold medal contest was held on Y night most successfully. These workers are enthusiastic and energetic.

EVERY union in the country with one exception was represented at the Davidson county, South Dakota, convention, October 30 in Mitchell. The reports were, everything considered, highly gratifying and the workers were encouraged.

SOME of the best workers of Nebraska are expecting to leave the state this winter—Mrs. Bigelow, superintendent of foreign work, Mrs. L. S. C. Brakefield, president of the ninth district, and others. Rev. Augusta H. Chapin, D. D., of Omaha, was a member of the recent convention.

MRS. HOFFMAN writes that the banner reported at Cleveland as lost by Missouri was never lost at all, but was in the Temple at Chicago, directed to care of Mrs. Hunt for the Chicago Convention. The reason it did not come to light there and then in 1893 was because it was not inquired for.

MADISON, Wis., union met in the afternoon of the day appointed for prayer by the National evangelist. The program given by her was carried out as nearly as possible. All hearts grew warm and hope grew strong as they listened to the Crusade Psalm and the chapter from Isaiah, and sung "How Firm a Foundation."

WHITE-RIBBONERS were grieved to learn of the death of Mrs. Florence Nichols Mann, daughter of Mrs. Josephine Nichols, of Indiana. It was owing to her attendance at the sick bed of this daughter that Mrs. Nichols' presence was missed at the National Convention. Sympathy goes out to her from a multitude of sister hearts.

ON October 4 Mrs. Lois E. Trott, president of the Mt. Vernon W. C. T. U. during a term of thirteen years, left her labor for rest and reward. Her illness was a short one, and she died as Christians alone can die. Mrs. Mary T. Burt, president of New York state W. C. T. U., took charge of the services, which were held in Willard Hall.

COMMENTING on the recent article on our editorial pages, referring to peace and arbitration, a correspondent writes: "If the church sanctions and encourages this warlike training where will the church be likely to find itself? Is it not catering to its own destruction? An article in the October Arena on 'Plutocracy's Bastiles' gives or indicates the true meaning of this uncalled for military training."

HER own (the second) district of Ohio W. C. T. U. has passed resolutions in memoriam on the death of their beloved leader and comrade, Mary A. Woodbridge. The board of trustees of the National Temperance Hospital took similar action. Rev. Father Cleary, president of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union, has sent a letter of condolence. Delaware, O., W. C. T. U. held a memorial service, November 7.

AMONG the thoughtful resolutions of the recent St. Louis, Mo., district convention, Mrs. E. B. Ingalls, president, was one recommending that at the close of each W. C. T. U. meeting in the district, ten minutes be given to the discussion of articles in the latest numbers of THE UNION SIGNAL allowing each lady two minutes. Such a practice would prove educational, broadening and helpful to every local union.

EVANGELISTIC work in Illinois has made excellent progress during the year under the active superintendency of Miss Anna Downey, of Evanston, and her associate, Miss Mary Mahon, of Moline. The plan of holding county evangelistic conferences lasting three nights and two days has proved most successful and beneficial in results. The conferences were followed by sweeping revivals in the churches, and the sympathy of pastors and churches was won.

THE little almanacs containing a brief text for every day, prepared for the use of members of Y. W. C. T. Unions, and equally suitable for W. C. T. Unions, will be ready about the middle of December, price five cents each. Y badge pins make suitable Christmas gifts when an inexpensive token is desired. Price, gold, one dollar each, silver, thirty-five cents each. Order both almanacs and badges from Mrs. F. S. Evans, 161 West Eighty-fourth street, New York city. Money orders should be drawn on station W., New York.

ONE of the resolutions adopted by the North Carolina W. C. T. U. state convention was this: "Resolved, that we are opposed to lynching as a method of punishment, no matter what the crime, and irrespective of the race by which the crime is committed, believing that every human being is entitled to be tried by a jury of his peers."

MISS FRANCES ENSIGN, National Y organizer, will be in New York city during December and January when she will be open for engagements in the East. Miss Ensign is also state secretary of the Young Woman's Branch in Ohio, where she has been most successful in enthusing and enlisting the young people in temperance work. She speaks acceptably to general audiences and for W. C. T. Unions as well as Y's. For terms and dates address her in care of Mrs. Frances J. Barnes, 146 West 103d street, New York city.

MISS LOUISE MANNING HODGKINS, editor of the Heathen Woman's Friend, writes as follows: "Our first W. C. T. U. meeting of the season in Auburndale, Mass., was a jubilant success. Mrs. Hauser is a bright woman to devise so interesting a lecture, and our union netted a neat little sum after paying expenses of lecturer and advertising." We hope that other local unions will hasten to do as well for themselves as the W. C. T. U. of Auburndale have done. Mrs. Jeannette Hauser's address is Room 1105 The Temple, Chicago, Ill.

MRS. ELLA FIFIELD, president West Washington W. C. T. U., writes: "In spite of difficulties our unions are determined to push the work this year, and I believe will take a long step forward in more complete organization, and increased working force. We have just closed a most successful three days' interstate temperance congress, held in connection with our interstate fair." She also speaks of Mrs. Ada W. Unruh as a bright, energetic, enthusiastic organizer, full of love for the L. T. L. work, and an admirable chalk-talker.

MAJOR AND MRS. E. T. SCOTT have been constantly in the field in California. Recently they gave a series of lectures at San Rafael, the second series within a month in that city. Large audiences, deep interest, many accessions to the W. C. T. U. army, and twenty-six young men to take the purity pledge, with converts to prohibition, are among some of the results. Three of Major Scott's lectures, and several by Mrs. Scott, have been condensed into leaflet form by the W. C. T. U. of San Rafael, and sown broadcast in that city and elsewhere.

MRS. STEPHEN MATTHEWS, of London, Eng., a National organizer of the British Women's Temperance Association, who was British delegate to the World's W. C. T. U. Convention at Chicago last year, and has since then been visiting our New England states, expects to be in California in February next and will be pleased to address parlor or public meetings or conduct Sunday services for any of our unions en route or in that state. She is highly commended by Lady Henry Somerset and Miss Willard. Address 21 East 57th St., New York city, care Madame Demorest.

MRS. SARAH A. MCCLEES, National superintendent of department of soldiers and sailors, during her stay in Southern California, has attended all their W. C. T. U. conventions and schools of methods. The "government beer saloon" in the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Home, at Santa Monica, is being investigated by her. The California and Nevada G. A. R. commander, I. H. Walling, a Good Templar, has strongly commended the work of this department. The plan of Ship Loan Libraries, so successful on the Atlantic coast, is to be inaugurated by this unceasing worker, among the Pacific seamen. Before returning east, Mrs. McClees plans to visit San Francisco, Portland, Ore., Galveston, Tex., and the posts at San Antonio.

As our Convention number did not contain the following resolution, offered by Mrs. Lowell and indorsed by the Convention, it is accorded space here:

WHEREAS, The effort to secure legislation in Ohio to vivisect condemned criminals confirms the assertion frequently made that, owing to their inconclusive results, experiments on live animals do not protect human beings, but only create a desire for them as subjects, and,

WHEREAS, It is persistently maintained by a constantly increasing number of able medical men that legitimate methods would result in truer knowledge, and because the nature of these experiments often precludes the use of anæsthetics, thus inflicting torture of a shocking character.

RESOLVED, That we, the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, believe vivisection to be unnecessary and cruel; and that it is particularly demoralizing in tendency when done before classes of young people, and we will endeavor to develop sentiment which may result in legislation for the entire abolition of the practice.

THE helpful visit of Mrs. Henrietta Skelton, National organizer to Nevada, has only made the young and growing state organization more desirous for temperance visitors who would like to view the wild Sierras, and at the same time give words of encouragement and aid to the struggling unions of the state.

MRS. MAI'E BODWELL BARNET ROBBINS, a true white-ribboner and a member of the National Woman's Suffrage Association as well as a stockholder in the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association, passed away November 19, at her home in Cheney, Wash. Mrs. Robbins was born in Methnen, Mass., February 24, 1815. She was of old New England stock, well educated and early interested in temperance and the abolition of slavery. She became a charter member of the W. C. T. U. of Cheney, in November, 1881, and was the hostess of the pioneer preachers wherever she lived in the West; a voter for several years during the '80's, when women voted; a member of the woman's foreign missionary society since 1884; a mother who taught her children the way of salvation at an early age; generous to all good causes, and kind to the poor and sorrowing. One of her children, Lucy A. Switzer, was formerly Eastern Washington W. C. T. U. state president. Side by side with the cluster of beautiful flowers upon her breast as she lay in the casket was the "bow of ribbon white."

SWINDLERS recently took advantage of the Poughkeepsie, N. Y., white-ribbon women, and the latter desire to expose the fraud, in order that sister societies and others may be on their guard. Two well-appearing men, representing themselves as agents for a New York house, presented a plan for getting out souvenirs for the union, in the shape of a bound pamphlet, showing excellent sample copies and letters from presidents of other unions. By the plan, advertisements were to be secured from local merchants and the union was to receive one thousand copies free, the men to do all the soliciting. The president of the union, naturally highly pleased at the plan, gave her sanction, and a letter to be presented to the merchants, showing that the agents were working on authority. The latter, representing themselves as under a salary from the National W. C. T. U., made a contract with a leading printer for five hundred copies of a twelve-page book with cover. When enough of the books were printed and bound to enable the swindlers to collect money from the advertisers (amounting to eighty dollars), the men suddenly left town and an accumulation of debt behind them. The union, while deeply regretting the occurrence, are innocent, yet have very rightly assumed the printer's bill and the delivery of the books, "sadder but wiser" women.

Cor. Secy's Notes.

The publishing of the annual minutes is just now the engrossing business at Headquarters. Work upon them is being rapidly pushed and it is confidently expected that they will be ready to mail before Christmas. The price, as heretofore, is fifteen cents per copy, which is but little in advance of cost of postage. Additional copies of Miss Willard's address will also be supplied at ten cents per copy.

The attention of the members of the executive board is especially called to those points which were referred to the general officers for decision and which may be found grouped under the heading, "General Officers' Meeting," immediately following the minutes of the post-executive meeting. Copies of the decision concerning the origin of the Crusade will be sent the unions in Washington Court House, O., and Fredonia, N. Y. This should have been done earlier, but in our eagerness to push the minutes we neglected to take copies before sending the decision itself to be printed.

One of the most notable events of the winter will be the triennial meeting of the Woman's Council in Washington, D. C., February 18 to March 2. The National organization will be represented by its President, who is ex-officio a member of the council, by the vice-president at-large, who is treasurer of the council, and by one elected delegate. Mrs. Clara C. Hoffman was elected that delegate by the post-executive meeting, with Mrs. Mary T. Burt as alternate. Full particulars of the evening to be devoted to the W. C. T. U., will be given later. Your corresponding secretary is already in correspondence with Mrs. Rachel Foster Avery concerning it and no effort will be spared to make it in every way worthy of our organization.

Thus early in the year may I ask the corresponding secretary of each state in whose confines any National or international gathering of note is to be held during the year, to communicate that fact, with dates, to me? The executive decided that the National corresponding secretary should have charge of the appointing of fraternal delegates to all such gatherings, and though I shall try to watch the papers with Argus eyes, it may easily happen that some convention of note will escape my observation. Therefore, I ask the state corresponding secretaries to consider themselves appointed a committee with me to zealously guard the honor of our society and see that we become ubiquitous whenever our presence can tell for our cause.

ORGANIZATION (always capitalized) is crowding to the front. Mrs. Ellen K. Denney, one of the new organizers, has formed the first union of which I have heard since Convention; but she tells her own story in the Organizer's column this week. I bespeak for that column a careful reading from week to week. There is none of more importance to our work.

Miss Willard wishes me to say that it was an unintentional omission on page 103 of her annual address where she failed to mention that the 4th of July is Mrs. Hunt's birthday and has been designated as an important opportunity with which to make interest for scientific temperance instruction in the public schools by means of celebrations, processions, etc.; and that it should be especially observed in the celebration of Mrs. Hunt's birthday in that connection.

KATHARINE LENTE STEVENSON.

Treasurer's Corner.

The editor tells me she is short of space so I will take but a little room this week. Miss Willard's address will be ready to send out in a day or two—ten cents each. The National minutes will be ready before Christmas; they are fifteen cents each, which will only about cover postage. Please send direct to the treasurer for both.

Many friends are still sending in self-denial mites. Mrs. Laura Cunningham sent $1 from Cadiz, but no state named, and as there are eight states with that postoffice, I could not send receipt. Two faithful white-ribboners from North Carolina, Mrs. White and Mrs. Glenn, sent $1.50 to Cleveland by Mrs. Wilkinson. Mrs. Tobey, of Carpentoria, Cal., sends a generous donation of $5 from her union. Mrs. Clarke, of Oxford, N. Y., sends $3 that she has collected. Mrs. Homer Hill follows with $3.85 from Olympia union, Wash. Sue M. Johnson, Keyser, W. Va., sends $2. Mrs. Weber, Pawnee, Ill., $1.25.

One dear good sister sends $2 and says she saved it by eating but one meal a day for a week and by going without butter and sugar for two weeks. Now I must protest that we do not wish our dear women to go without proper food and we feel that it is wrong to abuse the body to replenish even the National treasury. Leave off luxuries but not those things that are necessary to health and strength. We appreciate the devotion and love but feel that such women are too precious to be injured.

We are hoping for an influx from our birthday fund and are prepared to record and acknowledge it but will not reveal ages, especially octogenarians and centenarians.

For terms and dates address as above.

According to the plan adopted at the recent National Convention I have been made superintendent of the department of Organization. This means that I am to seek the coöperation of the state officers in an effort to keep the twenty-eight organizers and lecturers constantly in the field. The work of organizing will be made of paramount importance during the coming year. This column will be filled from week to week by the organizers themselves, who will recount very briefly work already done and give a forecast of future engagements. Thus, states wishing to secure organizers will know who are most easily accessible. The ten cent dues paid to the National treasury by new members are to be paid back at the close of the year to the organizer through whose efforts they were secured; this on the certified word of the state president.

The first organizer heard from in this new year is Mrs. Ella K. Denney, of Vincennes, Ind., she writes:

"DEAR SISTER:—With pleasure I received the announcement of my appointment as National organizer. This is the message God has given me through His word, for you and those who go forth under your direction to the work of reinforcing our grand army. 'Be thou strong and very courageous that thou mayest observe to do.' Be strong and of good courage; be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed, for the Lord thy God is with thee, whithersoever thou goest.'

"I am glad to report a society organized at Norwood Park, Ill., December 9, with fifteen earnest women as active and the two ministers of the place as honorary members. I have delivered three addresses and conducted fourteen gospel meetings since Convention and have secured one subscriber to THE UNION SIGNAL. My own motto for the year, which came to me in a moment of great discouragement is LOOK UP. I intend to 'look up' during the entire year and my hope for our great cause is that we may yet have a W. C. T. U. organized in every school district in our nation."

Miss Clara Parrish is open to engagements in Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, New Mexico, Arizona, Colorado and California during the fall and winter months. Any locality desiring the Y Branch strengthened and organized will do well to correspond with her at Paris, Ill.

The superintendent will not hereafter occupy the space belonging to the organizers in this column. It seemed necessary, however, to make these preliminary statements before entering upon what will prove, we trust, the most comprehensive part of our work as an organization during the eleven months which lie between us and the next National Convention.

THE WOMAN'S SIGNAL.

Edited by Lady Henry Somerset and Miss Annie Holdsworth.

Frances E. Willard, Cor. Editor.

Florence Balgarnie, Special Contributor

This is a weekly newspaper founded two years ago by Lady Henry Somerset, and already recognized as the leading exponent of women's reform and philanthropic work in the British Empire. It is thoroughly "up to date," broad in its sympathies, Christian in its spirit, the exponent of every phase of woman's work, but particularly of her associated efforts to advance the cause of temperance and purity. The paper is illustrated, and has interviews with distinguished leaders, correspondence from all parts, book reviews by Lady Henry Somerset, and constantly new features that keep it abreast of the times. Every local W. C. T. U. in Christendom ought to read

LOYAL TEMPERANCE LEGION.

A CALL TO PRAYER.

More and more, as the years go on, the conviction grows that our Loyal Temperance Legion work must be permeated with the spirit of prayer. Our efforts can never yield the highest results except as we have the enduement of power from on high.

As the church universal during the first week of January, 1895, shall belt the world with prayer, let the L. T. L. take its place in this current of supplication, and be borne into the boundless ocean of God's promises.

We earnestly ask each L. T. L. superintendent to arrange for at least one special service during the week of prayer for her own Legion, either alone or in union with others. Also that wherever practicable for several L. T. L. workers to gather, they hold special services of their own.

Bring to the children in their meetings the uplifting fact of the world-wide prayer for the coming of Christ's kingdom. The children will readily respond to the question: "How can we, as temperance Legioners, best hasten the coming of this kingdom?" Thanks to the training of the Junior Christian Endeavor and kindred societies, the children will probably be able to fill a part of the hour with their own testimonies and prayers.

While we thus secure for our work of 1895 a blessed beginning, let the faithful observance, both by children and superintendents, of our daily seven p. m. concert of prayer, link all its days in a chain of victorious faith and steadfast endeavor.

Matthew 15 :28 (first and second clauses). Mark 9 :23. Philippians 4 :19.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN WORK.

Miss Anna Lindahl, missionary of the W. C. T. U. at Ellis Island, asks that barrels or boxes of second hand clothing, especially for the use of women and children, be sent to her for the destitute among the immigrants; many of these come from warm climates and suffer greatly on arriving in our cold winter weather. Direct to Anna Lindahl, W. C. T. U. missionary, Ellis Island, New York.

I am constantly solicited for tracts and leaflets free. Our dear, good women seem to think I have an appropriation that ought to enable me to supply tracts free of charge. If they will think a moment they will know this is impossible. Nothing would please me better than to be able to distribute tracts freely; but out of my appropriation I must pay the salary of Miss Lindahl this year, my own clerical assistant, get all the translation, printing of tracts, postage, current expenses, etc., etc. I have already contracted for almost as many new tracts to be translated and published since the Convention as my appropriation amounts to. I supply Ellis Island free of charge, costing about ten dollars monthly, and beside this give to many who are not able to buy them; but I must sell them usually, so as to help keep up expenses. I have put them at as low a figure as possible, one dollar per one thousand pages. SOPHIE F. GRUBB,

RELIGION is the best armor in the world, but the worst cloak.

THE Crown Prince of Germany, aged twelve, upon hearing his teacher say that "all mankind are sinners," inquired if this applied to the high as well as to the humble. Being told that such was the case, he answered: "Well, my father may be a sinner, but my mother isn't."

A LITTLE bit of Patience often makes the sunshine come,
And a little bit of Love makes a very happy home.
A little bit of Hope makes a rainy day look gay,
And a little bit of Charity makes glad a weary way.

IT will be a happy day for workingmen when they deliver themselves from the leadership of men who do not regard the Sabbath.

IT was the first time Johnny had ever heard a guinea hen. "Oh, ma!" he shouted, "come and hear this chicken a-windin' itself up!"

Books for Mothers and Daughters.

Confidential Talks with Young Women. By LYMAN B. SPERRY, M. D., Lecturer on Sanitary Science, Carleton College, Minn Author of "Concerning Narcotics," "Confidential Talks with Young Men," etc. With introduction by Frances E. Willard and Mary Wood Allen. 16mo, cloth, 75c.

This helpful volume, treating an important subject from a Christian, medical point of view, should be carefully read, and its contents imparted to the daughters of to-day.

In all the long catalogue of useful books published by Revell, I know of none more likely to do noble service than Dr. Sperry's two series of "Confidential Talks with Young Men and Young Women." These books treat of subjects the most delicate in an absolutely plain and fearless way without that mischievous vagueness so often assumed by writers of such books—a prudery that aggravates by its half-suggestions whatever pruriency may be lurking in the mind of the reader.—Golden Rule.

The Science of Motherhood. BY HANNAH WHITALL SMITH, author of "The Christian's Secret of a Happy Life." Paper, board and illuminated cover. 12mo, 35c.

"To be a mother is the grandest vocation in the world. No other human being has a position of such power and influence. She holds in her hands the destiny of nations, for to her is necessarily committed the making of the nation's citizens." This extract from the author's prefatory chapter but enunciates the principle of the little volume, and our readers are sufficiently familiar with the gifted author's former volumes to realize that in this new line of thought they will have a helpful treatise.

INTOXICATING liquor has been tabooed at Toynbee Hall, University Settlement, in London.

OVER two million Bibles have been distributed by the Netherlands Bible Society since 1814.

THE latest statistics show nearly one hundred and fifty thousand more females than males in Sweden.

GLASGOW has four hundred prison cells for women, and drink most frequently puts occupants in them.

IN three southern states, North Carolina, South Carolina and Alabama, the age of consent is fixed at the inexcusably low figure of ten years.

DECEMBER 23 is Peace Sunday, when ministers of all denominations are requested to emphasize the first word of the season's refrain, "Peace on earth, good will among men."

THE late Mrs. General Booth, speaking for the Salvation Army, said: "We have no hesitation in affirming that strong drink is Satan's chief instrumentality for keeping the masses of this country under his power."

IN a report on tobacco and its effect on youth, the board of health of New Jersey says: "If we read aright the indications of natural law, this herb (tobacco) belongs to the category of poisonous drugs, and is in no sense a proper food or luxury for the young."

IN the recent public conference to discuss the Gothenburg system in Edinburg both sides of the question were vigorously presented, those in favor asserting the time-worn and disproven proposition that prohibition is a failure and those opposed strenuously supporting prohibition as an actual possibility.

OHIO'S law against food adulteration is very explicit. For ten years the following act has been in force: "No person shall, within this state, manufacture for sale, offer for sale, or sell, any drug or article of food which is adulterated, within the meaning of this act." The Ohio Dairy and Food Commission, through its efforts in testing and exposing food adulterations, has caused the arrest and prosecution of many dealers and manufacturers of these goods as well as giving aid to the home keeper and consumer. In Massachusetts also this question has received public and scientific investigation, much to the help of the health and well-being of the community.

THE following resolution was adopted by the Prohibitionists and Populists in one of our Western cities, each party retaining its name and organization and each being represented on official committee, the names on both tickets being the same. This is the plank on which they united: We demand that in the interest of morality and public economy the power delegated to the city council by the state laws shall be exercised to the extent of abolishing the saloons, the houses of prostitution and the gambling dens.

In another Western city the following was adopted as the basis of union between Prohibitionists and Populists: That we are at agreement on the question of equal suffrage, and are but little apart upon other great economic questions, all of which we are convinced can be readily adjusted to the mutual satisfaction of our respective parties. The chief difference between our parties being on the question of the liquor traffic, we therefore submit the following proposition on that subject as a basis of the union of our forces: The traffic in alcoholic liquors for medicinal, mechanical and sacramental purposes and for use in the arts being subject to gross fraud, imposition and abuse when conducted by individuals for personal ends and for private gain, should be exclusively vested in the state and conducted through agencies or dispensaries under such supervisions and restrictions as will most effectually limit the use of such liquors to such purposes; and believing that the use of such liquors for beverage purposes is destructive to the virtue, intelligence, sobriety, prosperity and happiness of the people and is contrary to the purposes and principles of good government, we favor the absolute annihilation and complete suppression of the manufacture, sale, importation, exportation and transportation thereof for such purposes.

Our Day and the Altruistic Review have effected a combination to be issued as a monthly, beginning January 1, 1895. Joseph Cook will be editor-in-chief, and Hazlitt Alva Cuppy, associate editor and business manager. Mr. Cuppy is a graduate of Heidelberg University, and has traveled extensively and formed important acquaintances with distinguished men abroad. He is devoted to the reforms which his Review, as well as Our Day, has heretofore advocated, and has proved his sincerity by many self-sacrifices. He was born in Indiana in 1863, and is giving the bright ardor of his early manhood to reformed journalism. The title of the combination will be Our Day: The Altruistic Review, an Illustrated Monthly Record of Reform. All the leading purposes of the magazine as hitherto conducted, will remain unchanged. It is expected that the distinguished group of hard-working practical reformers, which Our Day has had as associate editors, will be retained on its staff.

IF you sit down at set of sun
And count the acts that you have done,
And, counting, find
One self-denying deed, one word
That eased the heart of him who heard;
One glance, most kind,
That fell like sunshine where it went;—
Then you may count that day well spent.

"WHAT shall I do to gain eternal life?
Discharge aright
The simple dues with which each day is rife?"
Yes, with thy might.

I shall not live in vain.

THE storms of the sea touch but its surface. Beneath the waves that wreck the strongest ships there is a depth where the soft-flowered mollusk palpitates, and the delicate shell and tinted blossoms float in perfect repose. Time is the surface of the ocean, eternity the depth, and even now eternity may begin in the soul amid the tempests of time. Letting the anchor down into it gives a share in its calm.—*The Rev. F. A CHRISTMAS STORY.

1. Uncle John in a quandary.

UNCLE JOHN had five friends. Christmas was coming on at a great rate, and these five dear friends must be remembered. Now Uncle John had only $5—one ragged, weather-beaten, crumpled $5. Uncle John was in a quandary. How can a $5 bill be so expended as to gladden five hearts? One day Uncle John saw an advertisement of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the only paper in the world edited by Dr. Talmage, according to which he could get (1) a year's subscription to that brightest and best of illustrated weeklies; (2) a ruby type, leather-bound, Divinity circuit, red under gold edged Teachers' Bible, with Concordance and maps; (3) a copy of Dr. Talmage's "From Manger to Throne" richly bound in cloth and gilt (a beautiful volume of 544 pages, with over 200 pictures); (4) Gospel Hymns Complete, containing all the 739 Moody and Sankey Hymns in Gospel Hymns, Books One to Six—Six Volumes of Sacred Song in One, large type and set to MUSIC—maroon cloth, with red edges; (5) a copy of Dr. Talmage's "Pathway of Life," over 500 large pages, beautifully illustrated and elegantly bound in cloth, and weighing three pounds—FIVE PRESENTS FOR FIVE DOLLARS—each delivered to a separate address, if desired, all charges prepaid, and money refunded if not satisfied. Here was Uncle John's golden opportunity, and he was not slow in embracing it. That old $5 bill was sent post-haste, with full instructions, to Dr. Talmage, 316 to 326 Bible House, New York, and within a very few days thereafter all these goods were off in different directions, each one destined to gladden the heart and home of its recipient. Moral: Go thou and do likewise.

POLYGLOT PETITION.

Honored Rulers, Representatives and Brothers:

We, your Petitioners, although belonging to the physically weaker sex, are strong of heart to love our homes, our native land, and the world's family of nations.

We know that clear brains and pure hearts make honest lives and happy homes, and that by these the nations prosper, and the time is brought nearer when the world shall be at peace.

We know that indulgence in Alcohol and Opium, and in other vices which disgrace our social life, makes misery for all the world, and most of all for us and for our children.

We know that stimulants and opiates are sold under legal guarantees which make the Governments partners in the traffic, by accepting as revenue a portion of the profits, and we know with shame that they are often forced by treaty upon populations, either ignorant or unwilling.

We know that the law might do much, now left undone, to raise the moral tone of society, and render vice difficult.

We have no power to prevent these great iniquities beneath which the whole world groans, but you have power to redeem the honor of the nations from an indefensible complicity.

We therefore come to you with the united voices of representative women of every land, beseeching you to raise the standard of the law to that of Christian morals, to strip away the safeguards and sanctions of the state from the drink traffic and the opium trade, and to protect our homes by the total prohibition of these curses of civilization throughout all the territory over which your Government extends.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Mr. D. L. Moody is holding a successful religious revival in Lowell, Mass.

Forefathers' day was celebrated by Congregational church leaders, Friday.

The bill creating a national park at Shiloh has passed both Houses of Congress.

Mr. Mackensie Bowell has become Premier of Canada, succeeding the late Sir John Thompson.

The recent report that the Chinese Empress had committed suicide is now denied by a Pekin dispatch.

The cable announces the appointment by China of two peace commissioners, who will proceed at once to the Japanese capital.

The substitute for the Carlisle currency bill is practically a new measure. It was introduced Friday by Representative Springer.

Chicago's school board is considering the establishment of a pension fund for teachers by withholding one per cent of salaries.

An appeal has been taken to the supreme court in the case of Eugene Debs, recently committed to jail for contempt, on the ground that the injunction issued by the courts during the great strike was illegal.

John McBride, of Columbus, O., was elected president of the American Federation of Labor at Denver, last week, to succeed Samuel Gompers. Headquarters were removed from New York to Indianapolis.

A cablegram from Lima, Peru, states that over four thousand hungry women and children visited President Caceres asking for bread. On his order that they be dispersed, a riot ensued lasting several hours.

Sabbath observance workers in Boston are greatly encouraged by the action of the police board, which last Friday revoked the license of three theaters, for not complying with the requirements of "sacred concerts."

A CASE for large damages is that of Lucia B. Griffin, of Albia, Ia., who has sued an eastern cigarette firm for using her photograph on cigarette boxes. Miss Griffin is a handsome young woman and an elocutionist, but does not desire such notoriety as this brings to her. Such an unwarranted liberty should meet with the court's heaviest fine.

REV. WILBUR F. CRAFTS, who begins in this number a series of six articles on "The Fraternity of Reforms," is to give five lectures on "Christian Sociology" at Princeton Seminary during the first week of February, and the same at Marietta College on the third week. His work as superintendent of National Bureau of Reforms, inaugurated in September, was for a while suspended by sickness, from which he has just recovered.

THERE is trouble in the camp of the whisky trust. The president, J. B. Greenhut, has issued a circular calling for the reorganization of the company and it is meeting with great opposition from the members of the "trust." It is good news to Prohibitionists to learn from this circular that there are thirty idle distillery plants and that "public prejudice" against this nefarious "trade" is the chief factor in the present crippling of the "business."

A LARGE delegation of Christian clergymen, headed by Rev. Jeremiah Strong, of Boston, secretary of the Evangelical Alliance, visited Secretary Gresham last week to plead for a thorough investigation by the United States into the massacre of Christians in Armenia. This visit was most timely. If one-tenth of the atrocities reported by the press have been committed in Armenia it is time this Christian government arose in all its majesty to put a stop to them.

ANOTHER victim of cigarette smoking is Robert Louis Stevenson who died recently. Not long ago he said, "I have practically overcome the cigarette habit. I find myself reduced to five boxes of cigarettes a day." The St. Louis Republic reporting this comments as follows: "The habits of a man who could exult over a 'reform' like that must have been wearing indeed. One who knew him well says, 'He practically smoked all day, and was rarely without a cigarette in his mouth. When he was, he felt miserable. Often when he waked during the night while he lived in New York he would light a match and smoke half a dozen cigarettes in bed, while wooing renewed sleep. The result was that when he left for Samoa one of his lungs was beyond medical remedy.' Thus, another great literary light goes out with cigarette smoke."

THE great convention of the American Federation of Labor closed its sessions in Denver, December 18. It is a matter of congratulation that our representative, Mrs. Eva Higgins, president of Colorado W. C. T. U., was received with great applause and her remarks given careful hearing. Greatly to the regret of all, Mrs. S. E. V. Emery, our National superintendent of the relation of temperance to capital and labor, was called to her home by the sad news of the death of her mother before she was introduced to the convention. The convention received Miss Willard's name with hearty demonstrations of good will, whenever it was mentioned. Mrs. Eva Higgins writes: "John Burns has done us good. His kindly criticisms and cheering words have been helpful to the newly enfranchised, especially. His admonitions to see to it that municipal rule be taken out of party control will bear fruit, I am sure." A marked example of the influence which the presence of women at men's conventions produces was the ruling out of smoking. At first the tobacco smoke was well-nigh unbearable, and the non-smoking men were as much annoyed with it as the women. Clean men should court the attendance of women at such places for their own protection if for no higher motive.

SINCE our issue of last week, in which we stated the serious condition of Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap's health, we are glad to learn that the physicians do not consider her disease to be such as we were led to suppose, but that she is suffering from some mysterious nervous disease, for which they are unable to find any assignable cause and therefore they call it general neuralgia. We cannot, however, report any improvement, as her condition remains unchanged, except that she creeps a little nearer each day to that border land which will bring release to her bodily pain and victory to her spirit.

IT is of the first importance that our state officers should make up their programs for the Chautauqua assemblies and other summer meetings in their respective localities. We have no doubt they will do this, and we especially ask them to arrange whenever practicable for the presence and services of Mrs A. S. Benjamin, of Portland, Ionia county, Michigan, who is superintendent of the department. As a matter of course, Mrs. Benjamin cannot attend every one of the hundreds of summer camps, but she should be present at the most important. It is in these meetings that we recruit new workers and correct false impressions concerning the principles and methods of the white ribbon host.

CARROLL D. WRIGHT'S bill for the national arbitration of strikes was introduced in the House last week. It provides for the appointment of a permanent labor commission of five persons to be called, "The United States board of conciliation and arbitration." This board will have power to act whenever a controversy arises between those subject to the act. It shall listen without prejudice to both parties and endeavor by mediation and conciliation to effect a satisfactory settlement. During the pendency of such arbitration it will be a misdemeanor for an employer to discharge an employé, or for an employé to aid a strike or to quit his employment without thirty days' notice. The incorporation of employés is encouraged, and employers are not permitted to require their laborers to sign an agreement not to become a member of a labor organization. The provisions of this bill are certainly practical and reasonable and furnish more hope to the laboring man than he has had for many a day.

MISS WILLARD sends us word that it is thought best by the general officers of the World's W. C. T. U. to present the Polyglot Petition to representatives of the United States government in Washington, D. C., on the Friday evening preceding the Monday on which the Women's Council opens in February. The date of the presentation of the Petition will then be February 15, and an all-day meeting under the auspices of Miss Willard and Lady Henry Somerset will be held previous to the evening meeting. As this is the first presentation of the Great Petition, and as the Women's Council follows it, we feel sure that there will be such a "rallying of the clans" as the capital has rarely witnessed. We give the date early that those who can be present may make plans accordingly. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the District of Columbia will soon make a special statement in reference to local arrangements. As a matter of course the Polyglot Petition which is to be presented to the British government at the World's W. C. T. U. Convention in June must first of all be brought before the government of the country in which it originated. Our leading speakers will explain its history, object and method. Let all men and women who are interested in the great principles which the Petition involves, namely: prohibition of the liquor and opium trades and the abolition of all laws for the legalization of impure living, note the date and send their prayers and sympathy to the great gathering at Washington if they cannot lend their personal presence.

WHICH WAY?

BY AMY A. GREEN.

Forward or backward, which way, oh, my heart?
Wilt thou grow tend'rer as years pass away,
Blessing the pathway of friends day by day,
Or, wilt thou grow selfish in living thy part?
Which way, oh, my heart?

Forward or backward, which way, oh, my mind?
Gathering knowledge like jewels so rare,
Treasures to brighten each oncoming year,
Or sinking, through sloth, into ignorance blind?
Which way, oh, my mind?

Forward or backward, which way, oh, my soul?
Upward toward Christ, growing like Him in love,
Seeking the lost ones to point them above,
Or downward thy path as the swift seasons roll?
Which way, oh, my soul?

Forward or backward, ye may not stand still,
Oh, heart, mind and soul, ye must all go one way,
And the journey is lengthening day after day,
But the way that you go must depend on your will.
Ye may not stand still.

PIERRE AND JEAN, TWINS.

BY ELIZABETH CUMINGS.

"Hey, Canada, what are you packing that trunk of yours for?"

"For home."

"Home!" Lummy Yates dropped his lexicons with a thud that made the student lamp suddenly flare. "Have you turned bank president that you can skip off home to spend New Year's?"

"I'm going home to stay." Peter La Mell's usually pleasant voice was hoarse and hard, and had a note that warned his volatile room-mate to silence.

"Well," said Yates after carefully ranging his books in what he called the "American half" of the case they shared between them, "I'm sorry; I suppose you're willing I should say that much."

Peter bent his chestnut head over his trunk in silence, putting in his belongings with swift skill. His blue eyes looked as if they were burning. It was clear that this visit home was not pleasant to think about.

"I'm awfully sorry," persisted Yates indiscreetly. Then his mind taking a sudden tack into possibilities he continued, "You're not going elsewhere to take your degree, are you?"

"No," replied La Mell briefly.

The little clock in the corner ticked on, and Yates settled himself to his mathematics as he could. But the inquisitive temper that made him a shining light in the natural sciences tormented him. Why was La Mell, the best Grecian of the seniors, going to leave so near his graduation?

His round head hummed with the question. A scrape was impossible, for the tall Canadian's faults were of the open sort, and if he had been sent away all the world would have known the reason. There must be trouble at that far-off northern home. With all his levity little chubby Yates had delicate feelings. He put a curb on his tongue and gave his friend such attentions as were possible. He mended the fire, spluttering in the smoky fire-place, and got out what he called his "hospitality," a pink tin box which he kept more or less full of candy. But La Mell, always reserved, did not soften to these blandishments. In the gray of the morning he was gone. But I must explain a little.

Father Gabriel's liver was troubling him. It often did after a severe winter, and winter is always more or less severe in Caughnawaga. Nevertheless he did his duty by his people, and he had been far up the côte to pray with a sick squaw, a pious and industrious creature. But the liver is a terrible gland, so Father Gabriel, who was by nature of a blithe and happy temper, was not only weary, but melancholy, and he looked at the new moon that hung a silver sickle in the southwest and sighed heavily. Delicious scents of juniper and white cedar, of lilacs and blossoming grapes were in the air, for the brief northern summer was just begun. But he did not note them. He thought there was a smell of coal gas in the street, which was quite impossible, for no one in the village used that obnoxious fuel in summer, and the Algerian had passed down beyond the beautiful web of the Victoria bridge to the savage Lachine rapids a little after five o'clock.

If there was no real smell of gas to justify his irritability, there was an ear-tormenting sound. Shoemaker La Mell's blue and red boot creaked on its support in a way that made one thankful that before each door in the village there was not such a nuisance, and the old man quickened his steps toward the red glow streaming out of the open door determined to speak about it, when he saw just within, seated in the chair he considered his own, his pet abhorrence, Dr. Bassett.

The doctor had begun life as a Methodist preacher. Picking up a smattering of medicine somehow, he after a time became an independent medical home missionary. The priest's dislike of him as a false guide intruding into his parish to win youth away from the true faith was intensified because despite himself he liked the doctor as a man, and respected his skill, his shrewdness and kindness. He had no mind to meet him now and turned away to the dusty path leading to his own plain cottage. But Shoemaker La Mell had seen him and coming to the door and looking at him over his round spectacles cried, "Come in, Father, and wish me joy. I have twin sons born this very day."

"Bless me!" exclaimed the priest, and as he entered the shop he lifted his hand and added, "God bless you each and all. Well, well, Peter, one son would have made you rich. But two sons! You must give them both to me," and he flashed a sharp glance at the doctor, who was soft and blonde and apparently easy-going.

"The mother is such a Protestant," said the shoemaker waxing a thread, for with two new mouths to care for he felt impelled to be very industrious. "And as a bachelor, you, Father Gabriel, know not the perplexities of a husband. Eh, now! Women are obstinate, and they cry so, what can a man do?" and he looked impotently first at one and then at the other of his visitors.

"But, Peter, a man should be the head of his house," interposed Father Gabriel, his thin, dark face drawn into a web of wrinkles, "and I have always believed you a good son of the church."

"That talks easy," deprecated the shoemaker spreading out his hands.

"There is a boy for each of us," said Dr. Bassett fixing his cold, blue eyes on the Father's black ones. "You can teach one and I will teach the other, or my wife will."

"And I will teach them both to make shoes," said the shoemaker, much relieved. "When a man is fifty he knows that the great thing in life is to be able to earn one's bread. It scares me thinking of the two, for in ten years I shall be sixty."

"And in twenty years you'll be seventy with an ax over your head," said the priest, taking a pinch of snuff. "Well, you have made your bed and must lie in it. You know I was afraid for you to marry a young American, twenty-five years younger than yourself. But there's no doing anything with a blind pig, or a man in love."

"The twins will be the crutches of your old age," said Dr. Bassett rising.

"They are wonderful fellows and as alike as two green peas."

"But time will reveal a difference," said Father Gabriel as the two walked down the rocky street. "You will see."

And time did reveal a difference. Peter was silent and slim, quick with his head, and slow with his fists, while Jean was chubby and talkative, quick to strike, and slow to think. Peter would forget to eat if he had a book, or if he had a moment to gaze at the river which always seemed beckoning him on, on, to beautiful and wonderful things. Jean on the contrary always ate, and as for the river he saw it was a fine place to fish, and that one might earn one's living upon it easily if one had a place on one of the great summer boats taking folk with money to waste, about on pleasure.

Dr. Bassett taught Peter when Mrs. Bassett had taught him all she knew, and Father Gabriel had the training of Jean. To be sure, the Father, believing it was for the glory of God, baptized Peter when no one was looking, and Dr. Bassett gave many a talk to Jean that would have set a more thoughtful boy asking Father Gabriel questions, but spite of everything all went well on the outside, and Shoemaker La Mell and his Protestant wife lived together in perfect peace, and the boys learned shoemaking. Peter made the best shoe, and sometimes he helped Jean, who in return fought his battles for him. Indeed, Jean fought everybody's battles. When he was but six he flew at the blacksmith's boy, who was a whole head taller, because he, Moses, was trying to drown a cat.

"It's my cat," screamed Moses, "and I have a right to do with it as I like."

"It's God's cat," roared Jean, and the next instant he ran at Moses, his head down like a little goat, and down went the big fellow, and the cat escaping hid herself in a safe place. But a battle was fought, and Jean went home with a red nose that quickly became blue. Father Gabriel quoted the words of the Lord to him, "Blessed are the peacemakers for they shall see God."

"Yes," asserted the little warrior, "but, Father, I have learned the verse that comes before that, 'Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy,' and Moses had no mercy, and I pitied the poor kitty, so the good God will forgive me if I did not do right."

Father Gabriel took a pinch of snuff. He always did when he wanted a minute to think, and when he felt like laughing and must not. He had a small opinion of Moses who was at once a bully and a coward, and he was secretly glad. "Well, well," he said kindly, "I suppose you meant right, but try kindness the next time."

(Concluded next week.)

A BACKWARD GLANCE.

BY J. FOWLER WILLING.

A typewritten letter lies before me, signed by the clear, steady, even hand of Mary A. Woodbridge. It reads:

DEAR MRS. WILLING:—As I write your name I am reminded of the long ago when I sat on the edge of the bed in your room at Chautauqua, and you with Mrs. Emily Huntington Miller, were made a committee to issue a call for the gathering of the Crusade elect at Cleveland, in November, 1874.

Looking back at those old days, we take courage from noting how much God can bring out of a little, timid, uncertain service.

We hoped in a hazy way that good would come of what we were doing, or we would not have done it; but I venture to say that none of us dreamed of the noble army of queenly women who would be called to the front by the work we were planning; nor the costliness of the gifts that would have to be laid on its altar. The putting aside of sweet home amenities that women dearly love, the living in the open that they dislike, the wanderings hither and thither, the hurried rushings off, the weary, wayside waitings, keeping engagements while the heart is left behind with an invalid whose eyes are on the clock-face, the lightnings that leap from ugly, little envelopes, like panthers, trying to tear the life out, the night hours that drag their load of dreads over tired brain and wide-open eyes, till daylight brings better tidings, the falling at last far from kindred, like our beautiful "Yolande," our brave Mary Allen West, and now our strong, self-immolating Mary A. Woodbridge, all this was unthought of those Chautauqua days. Though I think that if they had known the costliness of the offering, those women would have gone on; for they had looked into the abyss of the world's sorrow, its awful agony from wrecked homes and ruined lives.

They launched their little enterprise as timidly as Jochebed set the world's law-giver adrift in his bulrush boat on the Nile, and with quite as many fears for its safety. They were suffragists, Good Templars, church members, and what not; yet they were desperately afraid that some specialist would get hold of their small craft and steer it into a land-locked harbor. They might have known that God held the helm, and He would give it a good voyage in spite of their puny worries.

In the work of to-day we need to know that God always stands

"Within the shadow,

MY MOST MEMORABLE CHRISTMAS.

BY EX-GOV. JOHN P. ST. JOHN.

"The most memorable Christmas of my life" occurred at a point west of Colusa, Cal., on the Pacific Coast Range mountains, where a half dozen hunters, myself among the number, encamped for the winter of 1857.

It was agreed that the man who should kill the most deer between the rising and setting of the sun on Christmas, should take all. I killed nine and won the prize. It was not because I was the best marksman, for there were others in the camp equally as good as myself, but it seemed that a streak of good luck lingered in my pathway during the day.

It happened in this way. I started out early in the morning, accompanied by an unarmed old Indian, whom we had nicknamed "Skap." We had scarcely gone half a mile from camp when I downed a beautiful three-pronged buck. A mile farther up the mountain I killed my second deer. We were greatly encouraged and pressed on up to the snow line, where deer usually were the most plentiful; but to our surprise we failed to find any more until about noon, when having turned our course obliquely down the mountain, we suddenly came to an almost perpendicular rocky bluff, and looking over into a little valley or level spot of ground covering not more than an acre just below, we saw eight deer. Slipping quietly behind a big pine tree standing near the edge of the bluff, where I had a full view of the ground below me, I drew down upon a large six-pronged buck which I supposed to be the leader of the herd, and at the crack of my rifle he fell. Deer never knowingly run into danger if they can help it.

The wind, as well as the position I occupied, was in my favor. The echo seemed to confuse them. They did not know from what direction the danger came. So they simply ran in a short circle, stopping near the point where the first one fell. A second shot killed another and seemed to intensify the confusion. They did not know in what direction to run to get out of danger, so they repeated the short circle. Another was killed; another, another, and so on until seven had fallen. The eighth, a splendid looking doe, stood there trembling like an aspen leaf. I really felt sorry for her, for the thought struck me that the one just killed, being only half grown, was her baby. But I was anxious to win the prize.

I had already killed nine, and deer were worth $10 per head in the market, and who should stop under such circumstances to consider a mother's grief, when her baby could be sold for revenue?

So bang went my gun, and down dropped the doe; but I had only creased her, and she had barely fallen, when she sprang to her feet and dashed down the mountain at a frightful speed, crossing a canon. As she struggled up the rocky steep beyond, she suddenly paused, and looking back across the chasm, she gave a last pitiful call for her baby, but it answered not, 'twas dead.

"Skap" said, "She heap cry, no shoot any more," and I didn't.

She passed on out of sight only to meet her death a half hour later at the hands of another hunter, who, that evening turned her over to me as one of thirty-six deer which fell to my lot as the man who, by reason of having killed the greatest number, was entitled to all.

To-day our government commissions 245,000 hunters, who, armed with poisonous liquors, waylay, entrap and destroy the mother's boy. She is confused, dazed, she knows not where to turn for safety. At last, as she sees her dear ones go down, one by one, she cries out aloud in her desperation, "Come back, come back," but they answer not; they are dead. They have been sold to the devil for dollars, upon which is stamped the national lie, "In God We Trust."

THE FRATERNITY OF REFORMS.

I.

BY REV. WILBUR F. CRAFTS.

All reforms are relations. So are vices. One-idea reforms pertain to the individualistic ages of the past, of whose people only a few Rip Van Winkles survive. Steam and electricity have socialized the world. Vices quickly recognized this sign of the times, and became "liberty leagues." Reforms more slowly formed "unions."

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union, which at first meant only a "union of persons" to promote "Christian temperance," and which still makes that its one test of fealty and fellowship, has become a union of purposes also, having broadened its line of battle, because it found its enemy's battle line extended.

Since all vices are fighting allies of the saloon, temperance forces should antagonize them all as its foes. The forty departments of the W. C. T. U. include only the ripest one-fourth of current reforms. The King's Daughters are another "do-everything" society. The "do-everything policy" has also, through the teaching of actual warfare, come to be the policy of the Prohibition party, although its name still proclaims, and we hope ever will until victorious, its only test of fealty.

The other reform party believes still more in the "do-everything policy" in its own industrial field. And the old parties are adopting ever-enlarging "platforms," which in their case, as Chauncey M. Depew wittily said, "are like railroad platforms, used only for getting in."

The Endeavor good citizenship movement, the programs of the Evangelical Alliance conferences, the institutional churches, the university settlements, all aim at many reforms, not one only.

Individuals who enter upon practical study of any one reform usually find themselves led into another and another. Miss Willard starts out to study temperance, and becomes also the special advocate of labor, of purity, of the whole circle of Christian reforms, putting more statesmanship in her annual review of public affairs than any President dares to put into his annual message.

So again Prof. Richard T. Ely starts to study labor, and presently is writing temperance tracts. John Burns and Terence V. Powderly also come to be temperance advocates through labor leadership. Mrs. Josephine Shaw Lowell devotes her great talents to the new science of charity, and presently is the Joan of Arc in the victorious sweaters' strike.

In Chicago and New Orleans working men start out to secure emancipation from Sunday slavery, with no thought of becoming "temperance fanatics," but finding the Sunday saloons the center of the forces that resist their rightful demand, they make the closing of saloons a prominent part of their program, and learn also the fallacy of the saloon's pretense of friendship for labor.

The newest reform movement, that for municipal reform, is yet too new for its advocates to have learned what their brave and noble-spirited leaders may be trusted to learn in due time from their friends, the enemy, that the citadel of their foes is not "the ring" but the rum.

Rev. Dr. Charles H. Parkhurst, the most influential force in the recent overturning of bosses in New York city and state and elsewhere, judging by the wine dinner witn which his "good government clubs" celebrated his victory, and his reported refusal to say whether he was opposed to the proposed legalization of Sunday saloons, has not yet learned what so brave a man may be trusted without abuse to learn ere long, that turning out Tammany has not banished the tiger, but only changed the tiger's keeper.

The domination of the saloon in politics is the tiger, and until that is killed neither changing Congress nor changing city officers will permanently lessen political corruption. In the words of Mr. Charles Stewart Smith, president of the New York Chamber of Commerce, and Dr. Parkhurst's most influential lieutenant, "When the rum question is settled here we shall have good government."

Municipal reform, when it is ripe, will include in its attacks, as the united forces of its foes, the liquor traffic and drinking usages, gambling in all its forms, impurity, injustice to labor, unrestricted immigration, the spoils system and wilful pauperism. The "ring" attacked is found, on close fighting, to include this whole circle of vices, against which must be marshalled the whole circle of Christian reforms.

Clifton Springs, N. Y.

AN IMPORTANT MOVEMENT.

BY MRS. C. B. HOPKINS.

A little over a year ago, through the influence of Mr. Charles Bulkley Hubbell, member of the municipal board of education, an Anti-Cigarette League was organized in Grammar School No. 69, in New York city. During the brief period that has since elapsed, the movement, thus inaugurated, has spread not only into every grammar school in the city, but has passed beyond the boundaries of the state into nearly all of the large cities of the nation. In New York city forty thousand boys, and elsewhere more than two hundred thousand boys, have signed the league's pledge.

The plan is to organize anti-cigarette leagues in all schools where boys are taught. After consultation with their parents they are asked to sign the following pledge:

We, the undersigned, pupils of Grammar School No. —, do hereby pledge ourselves upon honor:

1. From this date to abstain from smoking cigarettes in any form until we reach the age of twenty-one years.
2. To use all influence that we possess to induce all public school boys of our acquaintance to give up and abstain from smoking cigarettes until such boys shall have attained the age of twenty-one years.
3. By giving the pledge, hereby made, and by signing our names to the above we constitute ourselves members of the Anti-Cigarette Smoking League No. —, of the city of ——.

The constitution declares that the object of the association "shall be the suppression of the cigarette smoking habit among the public school boys and other boys by personal example and any other means."

The following provisions are made for the organization of a league and the discipline of its members:

The officers of the association shall be a president, vice-president and secretary. There shall also be a council of ten members, all of whom shall be pupils attending the said school.

The officers of the association shall be elected annually by ballot on the first Friday after the opening of the school in September of each year.

The council shall consist of the ten boys, members of the league, who receive the largest number of votes cast by the pupils of the school at the annual election.

Every member of the league shall be entitled to wear the button or insignia designating membership so long as he maintains good faith and keeps his agreement to abstain from smoking cigarettes.

If any member violates his agreement and is reported to the council, upon proof that there has been such violation, the name of such offender shall be dropped from the rolls and he shall be required to surrender his button to the council.

Any member who has been so dropped, shall, after six months, upon proof that is satisfactory to the council that he has not during such period smoked cigarettes, be reinstated in membership and have his decoration restored to him.

Any member found guilty of a second offense by the council shall no longer be eligible to membership while a member of the school.

The decoration or badge shall become the property of the wearer unless deprived of it by act of the council as heretofore prescribed.

Elections and meetings shall not be held during school hours, and the principal of the school shall be present at all such meetings. A meeting of the league shall be held on the first Friday of every month of the school year.

Mr. Hubbell has watched the growth of this anti-cigarette movement during the past year with intense interest. He is more than ever of the opinion that untold good will result from this agitation and education among the boys of the nation. In an interview with the writer upon this subject, Mr. Hubbell said:

"The principal function of our American public schools is to equip the youth of our land so that they can intelligently discharge the duties of citizenship. This equipment must include sound bodies, sound morals and sound minds. The state is interested in the proper development of these three. Another way of stating the proposition would be that health, character and intelligence in its citizens are necessary to the stability and prosperity of the state. Weak, puny boys make dependent men, recruits for hospitals and infirmaries. Weak and vicious character in its citizens fills the jails and prisons and imperils the very existence of the state.

"Within the past ten years, and more particularly during the last five years, a vice insidious and demoralizing has fastened itself upon the youth of the country, and especially upon our school-boys, in a way to call for the most earnest efforts to stamp it out, and that is the vice of cigarette smoking. The vice is a specific one. The juvenile cigarette smoker draws in the smoke with a quick inhalation that sends it well down into his lungs, where a deposit of nicotine, volatile oil of tobacco and the oil of paper remains after each operation. This deposit is quickly taken up by the circulation and distributed through the system, causing injury to health and character and appreciably diminishing mental power. Frequent and increasing indulgence is an almost unvarying characteristic of the vice. It is a fascinating habit and soon compels a servitude, complete and almost helpless. The gold cure people realize this and will not treat any patient until he consents to abandon the cigarette habit.

"The cheapest cigarettes are most popular, and two or three for a cent can be readily procured. A nickel buys a box of them, and that quantity is soon insufficient for a day's indulgence. The boy who cannot raise a nickel honestly will get it, if need be, dishonestly. He will deceive and rob his parents and others to provide the means of gratifying his unnatural appetite.

"The watchful teacher will observe that the victim becomes listless, nervous and inattentive; he speedily loses his power of application and concentration of mental effort. He can no longer perform his daily task, becomes a truant, and in many instances, ends his school career a hopeless cigarette fiend, character, health and mind injured, perhaps ruined. A number of our public school boys died in this city last year victims of the deplorable habit. The physicians are unanimous in condemning the use of cigarettes by boys. One of the best known physicians of this city, who is the chief examiner for one of the most important insurance companies, has stated recently in an interview that he would not accept as a risk any applicant who had been a cigarette smoker between the age of eight and eighteen, so certain is the habit in youth to leave its permanent mark and lessen the chances of longevity.

"Sentiment can be best created and maintained through organization, and in this city we have organized anti-cigarette leagues in every public school where boys are taught. The object of the movement is to create a sentiment against the vice among the boys themselves. This is attained by first pointing out the evils that attend and follow it, giving the boys of each department a short, earnest talk, calling their attention to the terrific competition going on in all the large cities for employment among boys as well as men, and in plain and simple language demonstrating to them the theory of survival of the fittest; indicating to them how offensive the habit is to most employers, and how many will not employ cigarette smokers, not alone because they are prejudiced against the habit on their own part, but because they know it is offensive to their customers and clients, and for the further reason that they know that they cannot expect the same degree of excellence in the service of a boy who has surrendered to this vice.

"Another point to which I wish to call attention is that the greatest good, it is believed, will follow from deterring many thousands from ever contracting the habit. The boys are coming to think it unmanly, and the ethical value of the movement is resident in the fact that when a boy makes up his mind to stop being unmanly he will almost unconsciously strive to be manly, and here is the gain for the development of character.

"Still another interesting fact is that the movement is not confined to the public schools. Organizations already exist in many private and parochial schools. As the head of a very flourishing parochial school in the western part of the state said, in a letter to me, after stating that he had adopted our New York plan: 'The badge or decoration insures perseverance and admonishes respect in the wearer for the principles it stands for.'

"A member of the Boston board of education, at a recent meeting, declared that in his opinion a good deal of the blame rested with the masters and teachers of the schools. He did not think that any person addicted to the use of tobacco should be allowed to teach in the public schools. I, too, believe that any teacher who is a cigarette smoker should not be an instructor of youth. If such persons are already in the public employ they should be discharged. In this case example is far more influential than precept. A bad example demoralizes and successfully blocks reform work.

"During the past year I have had many letters from local and state Woman's Christian Temperance organizations. This subject, and especially the movement started in this city, has seemed to interest them greatly. I would like to say a word to these devoted workers. The crusade against cigarettes has begun. It has spread like wild-fire but there are yet many localities and cities where nothing has been done. Talk with the teachers, the superintendents or any one interested in the young boys and the schools, and start the ball rolling. You can do it. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union, with its thousands of local organizations, can accomplish immense good, in addition to its achievements on this line, by taking hold of this work wherever it has a local organization."

THE TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT IN DENMARK AND NORWAY.

BY REV. C. F. ELTZHOLTZ.

DENMARK.

The fourteenth annual general meeting for the Denmark Temperance Society was this year held in Hjorring, Denmark. The meeting was, as in former years, opened with public worship in the church. The annual sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Boggild. About three hundred delegates attended the meeting. The president, Mr. Cl. Johannsen, stated in his annual address that the society had had during the year an increase of forty-four hundred members. There are thirty-one ministers and two hundred and seventy-one school-teachers in connection with the society. It was stated by one of the delegates that the city council of Frederikshaven had decided that there should be one temperance saloon for every six hundred inhabitants in the city. Mr. Cl. Johannsen was reëlected president of the society. The annual meeting resolved unanimously to start an agitation for the adoption of local option for the whole kingdom. It was decided to circulate a petition asking the Danish government and parliament (Rigsdagen) to recommend and adopt a local option law. Denmark has never experimented with the unsuccessful Gothenburg system, which is a great blessing for that country. The above named agitation is a grand forward movement in the interest of temperance. I believe it will ultimately culminate in a successful agitation for national prohibition. A book on "Alcohol and Its Effects," has been published in Denmark under government sanction for the use of Danish school-teachers. It is expected that the teachers shall use this little book in the schools. Danish temperance workers are wide awake. The temperance movement is a grand success in Denmark.

NORWAY.

The Norwegian Total Abstinence Society held its twenty-seventh annual general meeting at Kristiansand, Norway. More than two hundred delegates were present—the largest attendance ever had. The society had, according to the report of the managers, held about ten thousand temperance meetings. A successful agitation in favor of local option has been in progress during the year, resulting in the adoption by the parliament (Storthinget) of a local option law for the whole kingdom. This new law gives women as well as men who are at least twenty-five years old, permission to vote on the whisky question. No saloon or Gothenburg dispensary can be permitted in any community if a majority votes against it. Norway is, as far as I know, the first and only country that has given women permission to vote on the liquor question. The managers also report that the society has a membership of 103,025. The Norwegian parliament has this year appropriated 12,000 kroner to aid the temperance societies in their work. All the (Samlagene) will, of course, not be voted down right away, but the law has been changed so that the local communities will not, as formerly, get all the profit from the dispensaries. The surplus will, according to the new law, be divided. It is estimated that the dispensaries will give an annual surplus of 2,650,000 kroner. Of this sum fifteen per cent (397,500) will be given to the local communities; twenty per cent (530,000) will go to the dispensaries to be divided among the temperance societies and other worthy institutions in the respective cities and their neighborhood, but mark: the temperance societies are first on the list of those institutions that have right to draw on the dispensaries for aid. The sixty-five remaining per cent (1,722,500) must be paid over to the national treasury. It is hoped that but a few communities will permit the liquor traffic to be continued in its midst when only fifteen per cent is received of the surplus wherewith to pay the extra expense for police, prisons, insane asylums, poorhouses, etc. This new law will partly be in effect Jan. 1, 1896, but it will not be in full effect before 1902. The president of the Norwegian Total Abstinence Society, Hon. Iven Aarrestad, is a member of the Norwegian parliament. There are at least thirteen total abstaining members of the parliament.

GOTHENBURG DISPENSARIES

If the liquor traffic shall be tolerated at all in any community or country I believe that Norway has adopted the best known plan for the regulation of this dishonorable and infernal traffic, which can never be satisfactorily regulated. I am, however, pleased to know that it is the intention of our Norwegian temperance friends, who are sick and tired of the Gothenburg system, to drive away the dispensaries and destroy the whole liquor traffic. If a country that has tried the best known system for the regulation of this unclean traffic is so dissatisfied with the experiment that it has adopted laws that provide for its discontinuance, other nations ought to take warning. It is not statesmanship to adopt a system that has proven itself to be a failure.

OUR CHIEFTAIN'S NEW YEAR MESSAGE.

BELOVED COMRADES:—We know each other so well that it is not easy to write anything new. In faith and practice we agree and in the practical purposes of life we seem to be practically one. The unity of thought, affection and will in all, strongly upholds each and comes to us at our daily duties like a waft of heavenly cheer. It has long been my custom to send thousands of individual messages at the happy holiday season, but the demands for help are so strenuous this year that I think each one of us feels the glad necessity of curtailing where we can that we may help to extend our giving where we must. In my recent annual address I gave you an extended picture of the inside of my mind and heart. It has been my wont to do this ever since you made me your president, and it would be greatly to my liking if you thought fit to send to our corresponding secretary, Mrs. Katharine Lente Stevenson, at the Woman's Temple, Chicago, for the Minutes of this year and to read not only my address, but those of our other officers and of our superintendents; for I feel sure that as subjects of conversation and debate you would find in that volume many sources of information and encouragement.

I rejoice that we have instituted a department for the LOCAL UNION in THE UNION SIGNAL, and I hope it will be maintained so long as our society continues, which I trust will be until it broadens beyond the Woman's Kingdom and becomes part and parcel of that great kingdom of home wherein man and woman shall sit side by side upon the throne of government, and work out the will of God in beautiful customs and magnanimous laws. Some of those who read this line will live to see that day, and the thought that each and every one of us is building her life like a fair block of marble into the stately temple of that truer government, is the happiest thought that we can cherish or express.

There is one request that lies nearer my heart than any other, and I will make it now and here, even as I have already done in my annual address, where as yet it lies perhaps largely unknown to my true and faithful coworkers "for God and home and native land." I ask you that before this first month of the new year has passed, the local union that you represent shall invite to an informal conference at least a dozen men in the community who are either Prohibitionists or Populists—if possible, let there be an equal number from each party. Ask these men to bring their wives and daughters, and make the occasion as homelike as possible; indeed, I think the meeting would better take place in the home of a white-ribboner. Having compared their views in an evening's talk, I beseech you to urge these men to put their names to the following pledge:

For the protection of the Home and the upbuilding of a universal Brotherhood and Sisterhood, I hereby promise to give my best thought and sympathy and to use my influence to bring about a better understanding between the two new political movements that seek to incarnate in custom and law the principles of the Golden Rule and of that personal purity in the habits of daily life that cannot be maintained while the saloon, the gambling house, the haunt of shame constitute an organized temptation in the presence of our young people and maintain their accursed trade over against our homes.

The use of the words "Golden Rule" is intended to cover all those principles and plans by which the Populists seek to reconstruct the national policy so that it shall be as advantageous to the development of labor as it has been to the development of capital. Our next issue of THE UNION SIGNAL will contain the platform of the Prohibition and Populist parties. It will be an interesting part of the conference that I have asked you to call if you will place these platforms side by side and cross out the points in which they practically agree, after which the effort of the conference should be to bring to an irreducible minimum the differences that still remain. The members of this conference should be then and there invited to form a Home Protection union, composed of men and women whose object it is to secure joint meetings of voters from the two parties, in which they should so far as possible be induced to sign the pledge here given and to agree upon a platform to be brought before a joint session of the county, district and state conventions of the two parties.

We have tried in vain to unite the national leaders, and we have learned by that failure that not until the rank and file have been attuned to greater harmony can we hope to achieve what we desire in the National Conventions. We have no time to lose; 1896 will soon be here, but if the work that I have outlined is done with intelligent persistence by our local unions we may help to bring Wellington and Blucher together in time for a Waterloo that will banish the capitalistic and liquor Napoleon to a labor and prohibition St. Helena early in the twentieth century, which shall not be man's nor woman's, but the century of the home, the people and God.

Now, note, beloved comrades, that I have not asked for money, but I believe that what I have asked is far and away the most important request that I have ever made of the most faithful following that ever woman had, and I have done this after more of thought and prayer than can be told. It is a simple thing to do, this effort to bring together a group of earnest-hearted working men and equally earnest-hearted Prohibitionists, that they may learn to see more clearly than they do now from each other's point of view.

Do not let this conference be the last, but let the Home Protection Union that grows out of it be increased in numbers and helped in sympathy by every effort within your power. May I join you in one New Year deed, and that is in sending THE UNION SIGNAL to the home of a wage-worker? Our paper is so broad and kindly and has in it so unmistakably the atmosphere of a pure home-life that this single act will mean a brightening impulse to the family into which the paper comes.

How I wish the Polyglot Petition might have more signatures from my own dear, native land! We are to present it to our government at Washington, February 15, and to the British government at the World's W. C. T. U., June 14 to 21. You will, I know, have your representatives much in your thought and prayer as they go forward to undertake these responsible and significant duties.

And now may "The Lord watch between thee and me while we are absent one from another"; though in heart, as I sit here in my little study, thinking and planning for the blessed white ribbon movement that goes on its shining way without haste, without rest, I do not feel that we are really separate, and it seems almost wrong to use the word "absent" at all. Let us rather say this in our deepest hearts:

"God is our home, and in that state
We cannot so far separate
As not to make the distant near,
And know the loved are always here."

With sisterly love to each one of you, and to all who gather with you around the family altar and the fireside hearth, I am gratefully and loyally yours in our holy cause.

Frances E. Willard.

A "TOBACCO CARPET."

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—A Washington paper is responsible for the following bit of congressional history: "When a new carpet is to be bought for the House or Senate, it must be of American manufacture. An artist submits special designs for approval which the contract requires shall never be duplicated. A velvet carpet is selected and if the artist is wise enough to have a good many figures that present the general effect of tobacco spit, it preserves the appearance after Congress has been in session a month or two." In the name of American womanhood I protest against the large appropriations Congress makes each year, that is taxed from the people for such shameful waste and extravagance. But there is a moral question that far overbalances that of economy. How are we to teach the coming generation the evils of intemperance and the tobacco habit when the halls of Congress where our young men ought to receive inspiration for goodness and greatness, are vile with tobacco fumes, and a few steps away that august body of statesmen can be accommodated with any intoxicant fancy may dictate. All this under the dome of the capitol of the greatest nation on earth. It is such evils as this that make woman suffragists of retiring women who prefer the sanctity and refuge of a quiet home.

D. E. J.

Washington, D. C.

DEAR COMRADES:—The last week of the Old Year! Our faces are as they have been—set as a flint victory-ward. May I not parody one stanza of an old battle hymn of the church, for our New Year watchword?

"Crowns and thrones may perish,
Kingdoms rise and wane,
But the hosts of temperance
Constant will remain;
Gates of hell can never
'Gainst our cause prevail;
We have Christ's own promise
And that cannot fail."

Mrs. Farwell promised last week to tell us how her union discussed "Physical Training—How best Promoted," and we are very glad to hear so practically from

THE RIPLEY MOTHERS' MEETINGS.

"Our opening Scripture reading was I Cor. 3, especial attention being directed to the verses, 'Know ye not that ye are the temple of the living God, and that the spirit of God dwelleth in you? If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are.'

"The subject of the meeting was introduced by an article on 'Preserving Our Health,' in which the following points were emphasized: health preservation is a religious duty; mothers forget, or are ignorant of the laws of heredity, and thus innocent children suffer, often for life; resolved, that it is possible for a mother to be too devoted to her children, injuring her own health and pampering them; the highest maternal devotion often consists in judicious letting alone.

"Housework should be apportioned to children according to their strength, not according to the amount of work or their willingness to perform.

"Attention was called to the hurried life of the present day, affecting children as well as mothers. Too close study, too many social engagements, too much dress. Growing girls and boys need to be taught that the important point is not what they do or what they acquire, but what they are.

"One mother dwelt upon the matter of scolding awkward children who are frequently meeting with accidents in their work or play. This often arises from a lack of coördination, for which a child no more deserves blame than for defect in sight or hearing. To remedy this, kindergarten training is invaluable.

"The inconsistency of neglect of health and prayer to God for safe keeping was noted with the following pithy advice: 'Friend, eat plain, wholesome food, wear sensible clothes, ventilate your house, be temperate, be prudent. In short, tie your camel, then trust in God and you may take cheerfully the dispensations of His providence.'"

I would like to add to the above what I heard a young woman say on the fourteenth verse of the fifth chapter of Matthew,—"Ye are the light of the world." "When I want my lamp to give a brilliant light I see that the lamp is perfect in every part, the oil of the best, the wick faultless, the chimney clear. I protect it while lighted from draughts and deluges, and I feed it but do not overflow it lest there should be a catastrophe. Then my room is filled with light." How the Spirit ever lives in and shines through these ill-treated bodies of ours is a mystery. How much more far-reaching and steadfast would be the gleam in this "naughty world" if the home of the soul was as carefully attended as the young girl's lamp.

GATHERING UP THE FRAGMENTS.

About a year ago there was a contributed article in THE UNION SIGNAL by Mrs. L. S. Sisson, called "Fragments: At Whose Door?" these "fragments" being the individual members of "the miserable submerged tenth." The article in question called out a responsive testimony from Miss Mary Stewart, of Norwalk, O., a part of which may be suggestive. She says:

"Many unions in our villages and small cities complain of no 'especial work' to be done. For such there is practical home work, that can be done at slight expense, and that will result in saving many of the helpless 'fragments,' besides training for the years to come better nurse-girls and domestics.

"Our union began in this way. A room was rented, old carpets, rugs, chairs, dishes, etc., donated, and a small sum of money raised, with which a second-hand stove was purchased, fuel, material for garments, etc. Of course, the news was spread far and wide, the 'fragments' children sought out, washed, clothed and placed in the school; some of the children from the well-to-do families were encouraged to come, as their cleanliness and good manners are found to be leaven that is most beneficial. A careful record is kept in each class of punctuality, neatness and industry, which is rewarded with material to be made into aprons and undergarments.

"Here are to be found bright and eager girls of all ages, from six to fifteen, anxious to learn all they can, from the overhanding of blocks to the cutting out and the making of undergarments. In the kitchen garden department lessons are given in waiting upon the door, making beds, sweeping and dusting, setting and waiting upon the table, the pupils being not only instructed but doing these things in the class. For example, in waiting upon the door, after general rules are given, one child is taught to act as the caller, while a second, acting as either daughter of the hostess or servant, opens the door and invites the guest to enter and be seated. Short sanitary talks are given, also talks on how to take care of baby, what to do in case of accidents, broken limbs, how to nurse one ill from fever, with songs, lessons in physical culture and stories read aloud, while the girls are sewing. Through this school we have taught the mothers many lessons, besides gaining an entrance into homes and hearts hardly to have been reached in any other way."

There are numerous inquiries regarding state W. C. T. U. papers. These organs are valuable to state workers, containing as they do reliable news of the work in local unions, items of workers and indispensable statistics immediately concerning state, county and local organizations.

For the convenience of all, the full list, so far as we know, with name and address of editors, is appended hereto. If there are others, or any mistakes in these, please notify Mother Experience:

And now for a

SPECIAL DIFFICULTY.

Q.—Will you please state in THE UNION SIGNAL, if the National Minutes are to be published this year, where they may be bought and the price?

A.—The National Minutes are published every year. They may be obtained from the National treasurer, Mrs. Helen M. Barker, The Temple, Chicago, at fifteen cents a copy. Miss Willard's address is in a separate pamphlet and costs ten cents a copy.

These two and other easily accessible helps to workers ought to be regarded as essentials and their possession arranged for in the apportionment of our funds. A lady wrote me the other day, "I would like to take THE UNION SIGNAL, but it is a luxury I must deny myself." Yet I know that many of the things accounted necessaries by her are luxuries to many who in turn call the official organ a necessity. As workers we need tools, and among others I can suggest no better than the above mentioned.

W. C. T. U. PRESIDENTS,

whether state, county, district or local, are hereby not only invited but urged to correspond with this department, and are depended upon to "speak in meeting" whenever they are so inclined, my only admonition being, "Brevity is the soul of wit."

MOTHER EXPERIENCE.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

And Stephen, full of faith and power, did great wonders and miracles among the people, and they were not able to resist the wisdom and the spirit by which he spake.—Acts 6:8, 10.

Again we sit in the gloaming of another year. Memory is busy; we are thinking more of our losses than our gains. Dear ones that were with us at the birth of the year have folded their pale hands and whispered their last farewell. In the Temple, one who was full of cheer, sunshine and helpfulness, said good-night and left us so suddenly it is hard to believe we will never be able to say good-morning to her until we meet where the years count not. In these closing days of 1894 the memory of Mary A. Woodbridge's life will come home to all white-ribboners most vividly and pathetically. It will be counted by them as one of the great losses of the year, but who can doubt it was to her the great gain? The battle ended, the victory won—

"The loved and lost!
Why do we call them lost, because we miss
Them from our onward road?
God's unseen angel o'er our pathway crossed,
Looked on us all, and loving them the most,
Straightway relieved them from life's weary load."

The name of this great and noble woman should find a place on the walls of Willard Hall. There is a small marble tablet over the platform where we would like to see her name engraved with mention of the high office she filled. This tablet should be set apart to her exclusively. Who will start a subscription for such a memorial to the memory of the loved and talented secretary of the World's and National W. C. T. U.?

Among the delegates from abroad who attended the National Convention at Cleveland, Ohio, was a bright, cultured and notable young woman, Miss Anna Cummings, president of Huguenot Seminary, Wellington, South Africa, and president of the Y's of South Africa. She brought with her from the Y's of that far-off country seventy dollars, which completes their pledge of one hundred dollars for the Temple. She told how deeply the dear Y girls of South Africa were interested in the "House Beautiful," and she herself was delighted when she visited it on her way to the Convention. It does seem that if the Y's of South Africa can raise one hundred dollars for the Temple, our own Y unions ought to be able to do more in this line. Miss Anna Cummings' name, at the request of the South Africa Y's, is to go on the tablet in Willard Hall, and well does she deserve this high honor.

Miss Sue Smith, Rockland, Mass., has just sent $70 on a personal pledge of a hundred dollars. Mrs. J. P. Harris, Bellefonte, Pa., sends $25 on a pledge of one hundred, to place the name of Harrold R. Harris on the Pennsylvania tablet in Willard Hall. This is not the first money Mrs. Harris has sent to aid the Temple. She writes: "I shall be so glad for you when the burden of this debt is lifted and our 'House Beautiful' is all our own." Ten dollars is sent by Mrs. M. H. Wells, Wellsville, Pa., to be applied on a memorial tablet for her brother, Mr. William Hunter; the money is the gift of little Robert Mulligan, her great-grandchild, seven months old; a picture of his sweet baby face accompanied the check. Mrs. Wm. C. Spalding sends $12 from the W. C. T. U. of Sault Ste Marie, Mich.; $15.50 comes from Rushsylvania, Ohio, W. C. T. U. through Mrs. Maggie Day. Mrs. M. E. Love sends $10 from the W. C. T. U. of Redlands, Cal.

Letters are being constantly received in commendation of our beautiful Temple spoon. Here are what some say: Mrs. Fanny C. Noyes, Dansville, N. Y., writes: "It is in every respect all that it was represented, and I shall cherish it as a pleasant memorial of the House Beautiful, which though I may never see with my natural eyes I shall always love to think of and pray for. May the dear Lord raise up many willing hearts with open purses until no debt rests upon this monument of faith." Mrs. Sarah L. Botts, Carthage, Ill., says: "The souvenir spoon arrived safely, and it is indeed a beauty. I shall prize it greatly and use my best efforts to have others send for it." Mrs. J. G. Parsons, Santa Rosa, Cal., writes: "The Columbian souvenir and the Temple spoon arrived safely. I love to look at them and show them to my friends." "We received your lovely souvenir spoon," writes Mrs. Bertha E. Spencer, Spencerport, N. Y., "and are all delighted. I shall keep it for visitors as it will always bring the Temple before them." Mrs. M. A. Finley, Brookfield, Mo., writes: "The beautiful souvenir spoon is just at hand. I thought I only wanted to help pay for the Temple and cared not for the spoon, but it is just splendid, and I am glad to have it. My mite-box has commenced duty for another year. I am over seventy years old, but I hope to see our House Beautiful paid for. I received the Columbian souvenir last year; that, too, is lovely." Our friends who have their names entered to fill a mite-box for the spoon should send them in at once, as the limit for filling a box to secure the spoon expires with the year.

All persons sending $1 to the Temple will receive the beautiful Columbian souvenir. Any individual who sends the contents of a mite-box, amounting to $3.65, by January 1, 1895, will receive a solid silver Temple souvenir tea-spoon. This, however, does not apply to persons filling boxes for unions; they receive the Columbian souvenir. All money orders and checks should be made out in the name of William D. Preston, and sent to our financial secretary, Miss Sara G. Johnson, the Temple, Chicago, Ill. All other matters pertaining to the Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, the Temple, Chicago.

THE CHILD KING.

BY H. A. DELANO.

"There is no king," the statesman said,
"The law and the rule of right
Are overruled, and virtue's dead,
The world is lost, 'tis as dark as night!"
But going home, he saw in the arms
Of the wife and mother there,
His babe, the babe who always warms
The heart of the world's despair;
And he said to himself, "Oh, innocent thing,
I thank my God there is yet a king."

"There is no truth," said the business man,
"Corrupt to the very core
Is trade, and Honesty, under ban,
Holds up her fair head no more."
That night a star shone o'er his home,
And the tender nurse, at morn,
Brought him the light that love must own,
The baby, newly born;
No longer his heart refused to sing,
For he said, "Once more there's an honest king."

"There is no hope," said the laboring man,
"For blood is the price of gold,
The rich are calloused, the poor are mad,
Heaven grows timid as hell grows bold;
There is no hope." At his cottage door,
A neighbor whispered, "The baby's here;"
He entered, and kissed him o'er and o'er,
Then crowned the baby with laugh and tear,
Thus joyous, he said to himself that night,
"Aye, baby mine, there is hope and light."

"No king, no truth, no hope," we say,
'Tis never so on Christmas night,
For oft, as the darkness hides the day,
The star in the east is gleaming bright.
So the story of love goes round the world,
"A child is born!" Immanuel King!
New banners of hope are wide unfurled,
The wise and the great their offerings bring;
The kingdom of peace comes evermore,
With the babe in palace, or on manger floor.

DEFENCE OF THE OLD MAID SISTER.

BY MILDRED MERLE.

"'Taint everybody what's got a old maid sister to look after their young 'uns."

Was there just the least suspicion of a sneer upon the face of the speaker?

"No, indeed," replied the young mother addressed, "it isn't every poor mortal who is fortunate enough to rightfully claim such blessed relationship."

"Wall, I allers knowed when Sallie wasn't more'n so high that she was cut out for a old maid. She was so prim and perticklar and a leetle mite pecoolyer, Mis' Mayfair, if you won't git mad at me fer sayin' it."

"Well, Mrs. Blaikie, peculiar or otherwise, I can testify to the fact that she is a veritable angel of mercy and a host of friends beside her immediate relations will attest the same. Probably I should have been in my grave years ago had it not been for her tender and thoughtful care over me in times of sickness."

"Yes, I've hearn tell how Sallie was a nateral born nurse."

"She has at least acquired great skill since the hour of her advent. Babies and myself owe her a debt of gratitude we can never repay. When weak from sickness, seriously threatened with an acute attack of the blues, she would appear upon the scene, and all the blue that remained would be the azure of the sky, which I had not noticed before, being so downcast, or perhaps the blue of the violets or forget-me-nots she brought with her, for she always brought something bright with her, sunshine, if nothing else."

"I've noticed that Sallie is good-natered as the day is long."

"Yes, and the night as well, even when trying to quiet restless babies so that the mother might have the privilege of enjoying undisturbed sleep in order to regain her strength."

"That's so, 'deed it is. I never see Sallie out of sorts day or night, whatever comes along of a upsettin' nater."

"You admit that Sallie is perfection in all these respects; then wherein does her peculiarity lie? Peculiarity must be a rare virtue."

"Oh, Mis' Mayfair, I never hed no idee of castin' inflections on nobody. Sallie's a dreadful good gal, but I can't help thinkin' it's a awful pity she didn't git no man to make happy with her helpin' ways."

"I happen to know that she might have acquired such a commodity had she so desired."

"I'm afear'd her relations'll make reg'lar slave of her, if she's so willin'; and I've allers hearn tell how a woman's proper spear was in a home of her own."

"But then you see, Sallie has several homes where she is welcome, not so much for her 'slaving,' as you term it, as for the sunshine that blesses every home in which she sojourns."

"Wall, I don' know, mebby 'tis jest as well."

LEAVENED WINE.

BY REV. W. D. KNOWLES.

More than one inquiring mind interested in the temperance cause and wine question have recently asked for an explanation of Deut. 14:26, and Numbers 28, the essence of which, from a temperance standpoint, is found in the seventh verse.

I offer the following explanation: Deut. 14:26, Numbers 28:7, must have been unleavened wine. Numbers 28:17, was unleavened bread. Consistency would require that the wine as well as the bread should be unleavened, and God is never inconsistent, though the translators of His word may be. The strong drink of Deut. 14:26 is the same as the strong wine of Numbers 28:7, and both referred to the sweet or fresh grape juice boiled down to a thick syrup, thus making its food properties and God-given virtues doubly strong, for observe in both cases it was to be, or had been, dedicated as a tithing or offered as an oblation to the Lord, and every offering to the Lord, whether as tithing or oblation, was to be without spot or blemish—the very best of its class. It was also just as imperative to be without leaven or ferment, which throughout the Old Testament is a symbol of death and moral corruption, hence was not acceptable to the Lord as a tithing or as an oblation.

Now it may be asked, how may we know that the words "strong" or "strong drink" or "strong wine" referred, not to alcoholic wine as it does in other places in the Scriptures, but to a double strength given to it by boiling it down to a thick syrup that would not ferment, or by other processes known to the ancients for preserving their wines fresh and sweet, just as the grape juice flowed from the wine-press, so far as its food properties on the one hand or alcohol on the other were concerned. I answer first as above set forth, because God is consistent and His Levitical law required, for reasons already given, that no leaven should be in anything offered as an oblation to the Lord.

Secondly, the almost universal custom of the ancients to have two kinds of wine, both made out of the original wine or juice of the grape. The first (just as our northern farmers make two ciders out of the same apples, sweet and hard cider) which was always regarded by good men as the best, was preserved, as we have above indicated, and often kept for a great many years. Pliny, I believe, mentions some kept for two hundred years, and Horace, born sixty-five years before Christ, speaking of these preserved wines as being like nectar or ambrosia, so delicious were they and also perfectly harmless, not producing intoxication even though one drank to excess. These wines retained their original God-given nourishing food properties without one particle of alcohol, death or devil in them.

But one may ask, how do you know there was no alcohol in them? We answer, because it is a scientific fact that alcohol is not produced without ferment or leaven, and the law, which they kept strict on pain of death, demanded that there should be no leaven in things offered to the Lord. But, says the objector, this was something not for the Lord, but for themselves to eat. Please read the context as shown in the 22d to 25th and 26th inclusive and know that while they were permitted to eat this food and use this drink, it was purchased with money obtained from the sale of tithings which were consecrated to the Lord, hence the money was the Lord's and whatever it bought was equally His, and His servant was mercifully and justly permitted to eat of it while absent from his flocks and fields, engaged in the worshipful service of the Lord.

Thus may we not guess or conclude or reckon, but we may and do know that even those strongest possible passages in God's word that seem to give encouragement to the use in any degree whatever of intoxicating wines or liquors of any kind, only add their weight to the cumulative evidence in God's word, in ancient history and in human experience throughout the ages, of the subtle and damnable character of alcohol, and that the woes of God are no less pronounced upon its most invidious form of wine when it giveth its color in the cup than upon its more bold and tiger-like aspect of rum, gin and brandy. To summarize:

First, God cannot be inconsistent. Second, the Levitical law [see Lev. 2: 11, also Exodus 12: 18 to 20] required that no leaven (which is the ancient name for ferment and without which it is absolutely impossible to make alcohol) should be in anything they ever offered to the Lord. Third, the ancients boiled their wine down to a thick syrup that would keep months and years, and according to Pliny, Columela, Horace and indeed most ancient authors, these wines thus made doubly strong and nutritious, but without leaven, were the best.

This explanation is in harmony, first, with the character of God, secondly, with the Levitical law, thirdly, with the facts of ancient history regarding the manner in which the ancients preserved their wines free from leaven and all toxic properties, and finally, it is in harmony with human experience and common sense and therefore must be correct. All persons at all posted on Bible wines will smile at the idea of Christ making alcoholic wine at the wedding feast or using it when He instituted the Lord's Supper. This is a back number too old to review. The evidence against such a position is absolutely incontrovertible and well known to every Woman's Christian Temperance Union woman who takes any pains to keep abreast of the temperance and religious times.

WHAT CONSTITUTES A MODEL SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHER?

BY ANDREW BATES.

The question refers to a model teacher, and not the model. There has been but one Teacher whom we could designate the model; all who come after are but reflections. Nicodemus has been allowed to place this truth on record: "We know thou art a teacher sent from God."

Sometimes a great truth is presented in clearer light by being stated negatively. The book of Psalms opens with such a bugle note: "Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful," and we may thus answer the question put to us: Blessed is the Sunday-school teacher who walketh not in the counsel of his own opinions, nor standeth in the way of too many lesson helps, nor sitteth in the seat of his own judgment, but whose delight it is to reveal the spirit of truth as it is in Scripture, and lead his class to meditate thereon day and night. Such a class will be like a spring of water rising up and flowing through the whole church, causing it to flourish.

The preacher and the teacher are not identical. A model Sunday-school teacher will not be a preacher in the class, but a leader. "Come, ye children, hearken unto me, I will teach you the fear of the Lord;" and again, "Then will I teach transgressors thy ways; and sinners shall be converted unto thee."

A model teacher will always be prepared with the lesson. In fact, he should be one lesson ahead of his class. The committee on the International Lessons is obliged to prepare them a year ahead; is it too much to ask of a teacher a much less labor, that his scholars may be greatly benefited?

"Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" A model teacher will be at his post a little ahead of his scholars that he may greet them. If obliged to be absent he will always have a substitute ready.

He will make his scholars his lesson helps, thus insuring fresh and interesting material. Lesson helps abound in illustrations; few can be found better than those drawn from the teacher's own experience.

The model teacher will require his class to furnish the questions; the answers will then reach listening ears. He will sift the lesson; much of geography, history, mathematics and even philosophy must be considered a course in reserve, necessarily shortened or omitted by the quickly passing Sunday-school hour. "The kingdom of heaven cometh not with observation." He will find and make prominent a central thought embodied in the lesson. This always is—the Christ, how manifested?

A model teacher will apply the lesson, first generally, then particularly. "The word of the Lord came to Ezekiel expressly."

It is needless to add, a model teacher will be attentive. This does not exclusively mean attentive to the general exercises, but attentive to his class. Many times a teacher has been noticed intent upon what the superintendent was doing or saying, while the class was amusing itself or causing a disturbance. The secret of an orderly Sunday-school session will never be discovered until each teacher constitutes himself a superintendent over his class.

Lastly, a model teacher will be a teacher and leader first, last and all the time; the class will be on his mind and in his heart through the week, the month, the year; in the church, at the home, on the street; in prayer, in society and in business.

A TEMPERANCE DREAM.

BY ELLA BEECHER GITTINGS.

"I HAD the oddest dream last night,"
Said little Tommy Dean,
"I dreamed that I was running
A temperance mowing machine.

"And brother Ed came just behind,"
Said this queer Tommy Dean,
"Running with six big horses
A temperance threshing machine.

"And this is how they worked, mamma,
The funniest thing, you'll say—
The mower mowed down each saloon,
That came within its way.

"And then the thresher threshed them out,
Oh, what a dreadful crash!
When bottles, beer-mugs, whisky-jugs
Together went to smash!"

And now, dear temperance girls and boys,
Say—every one of you—
Who read of this peculiar dream
Oh, don't you wish 'twere true?

THE OLD YEAR AND THE NEW.

The sleighbells jingle in their glee;
The joyous children shout;
And so with harmless revelry
The good old year goes out.
For God was in the year gone by,
And blessed us every day,
And led us through its flowing path
And winter's snowy way.

Our hearts are merry as the bells,
While with our voices clear
We sing the words the hope foretells,
And welcome the new year.
For God, who in the year gone by
Did bless us every day,
Will lead us in the steps we take
Along our forward way.

Then jingle, jingle, clear and sweet,
Each voice and bell in tune,
The years run on with hurrying feet—
Now winter and now June.
But God doth give us all the years,
And all the years we'll sing;
They lead us to a country where
The whole year long is spring.

—Rev. M. J. Savage.

HOW THE NEW YEAR CAME.

ETHEL and Alfred wanted to "watch the Old Year out and the New Year in." Mamma said "No" firmly, and then Auntie Bird pleaded. Mamma finally said they might sit up till nine o'clock and see how sleepy they would be then.

Auntie Bird was only a big girl herself; just the prettiest auntie, too. Ethel's great wish was to look like her, and Alfred admired her very much.

Alfred insisted on wearing his hat; "So I can run out to see the New Year the minute it comes."

"Auntie Bird," said Ethel, "what makes New Year's? Why wasn't it New Year's last Monday instead of to-morrow?"

Really, children will ask hard questions. The girl-auntie didn't know, but mamma whispered in her ear to look in an old scrap-book.

Bird was really Bertha, but the name was given when she was a baby because she cooed so sweetly, and it clung to the sweet-faced girl now. Bird read the page to herself, and then she told the children.

"You know," she said, "the earth goes round the sun, and that takes a year. The moon goes round the earth, and that takes a month. The moon goes round the earth twelve times while the earth is going round the sun once, so there are twelve months in a year.

"Many hundred years ago some people, called the Romans, named these months January, February, etc. Your birthday comes in February, you know, Ethel."

"Mine is the first day of May," suggested Alfred.

"Yes, dear; auntie won't forget. The Romans were heathen people, and it was long before Christ was born. They called January after one of their gods, whose name was Janus. His image had two faces, one of an old man who looked backward, the other of a young man who looked forward. So they chose the first day of January for New Year's day; the Old Year looking back over the past, the bright New Year looking toward the future.

"The book says that for many years after Christ was born the Christians wouldn't take January for the first month because it was named for a heathen god, but I suppose they decided at last that a name didn't matter much."

Alfred was blinking pretty hard by this time, and though Ethel declared she wasn't sleepy, she "thought she could wait until morning to see that young Janus."—The Young Idea.

MR. SPURGEON'S ADVICE TO BOYS.

When I was just fifteen I believed in the Lord Jesus, was baptized, and joined the church of Christ. This was twenty-five years ago, and I have never been sorry for what I then did; no, not even once.

I have had plenty of time to think it over, and many temptations to try some other course, and if I had found out that I had been deceived or had made a gross blunder, I would have made a change before now, and would do my best to prevent others from falling into the same delusion.

I tell you, boys, the day I gave myself up to the Lord Jesus, to be His servant, was the very best day of my life. Then I began to be safe and happy; then I found out the secret of living; and had a worthy object for life's exertions, and an unfailing comfort for life's troubles.

Because I wish every boy to have a bright eye, a light head, a joyful heart and overflowing spirits, I plead with him to consider whether he will not follow my example, for I speak from experience.

A SMALL boy surprised his teacher at one of the grammar schools by asking her how far a procession of the presidents of the United States would reach if they were placed in a row. On her expressing her ignorance, he calmly announced, "From Washington to Cleveland."—Christian Register.

GEOGRAPHICAL PUZZLE.

On a beautiful (strait between two islands of the Malaysia group) in the month of (cape south of New Jersey), two boys named (a lake in New York state) and (a city in Australia) accompanied by their sisters (a city in Italy) and (a river of Siberia) started to the L. T. L. meeting two miles away, and then were to spend the remainder of the day with some cousins, where they had been invited to eat (a country of Europe). They drove the (islands off the coast of Scotland) ponies, the girls wore their new (sea in northern part of Russia) dresses and (country of Africa) shoes, and it was as merry a party as one would wish to see. When they had gone about half the distance (the city in Australia) cried (a cape on the coast of North Carolina)! and as they turned a bend they saw coming toward them what appeared to be a (lake in British America). Intense (another cape on coast of North Carolina) took possession of all as it would of the bravest. But as it came nearer they saw it was only a large (island off the eastern coast of North America) dog that came wagging his tail in a very friendly way. (The river of Siberia) said at once, "We'll call him (the gulf south of France) because he gave us such a fright." But what do you think, boys and girls? It proved to be their cousins' dog, who had anticipated their visit, and had come to meet and welcome them. Shall we not always be kind to animals?

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—A Happy New Year to you all! Does it seem a very long time to the Cozy Cornerers since you gave and received New Year greetings a year ago? That will depend on whether the year has been bright and happy or just the reverse. Sorrow, disappointment and discontent are clogs which make the time pass drearily, although they may have the effect of purifying and lifting us upward and onward toward the best things in life. When the days fly fast, we are joyful and gay.

Has the record of the past year been one which you enjoy to look back upon? If you have woven into the thread of each day's life something which will make you stronger, better and more Christlike, then you can say yes. If you have made mistakes, and done wrong things, you can at the opening of the new year just resolve with God's help not to repeat them.

Do you know what I think is the secret of a Happy New Year? I mean why it is called Happy? Because we can throw off all the burden of the past year, settle up accounts and begin fresh.

Just at this time is the best opportunity to invite that boy or girl friend, whom you know, and who has not yet come into our "home protection" army to sign the pledge. While resolving for ourselves let us help others to resolve too.

A little New Year rhyme which I read somewhere comes to my mind. It runs like this:

"New Year, we bid you welcome!
New resolves have come with you;
We shall start with fresh endeavor—
Will you kindly help us through?

"Will you help us to be thoughtful?
Will you make us hate the wrong?
Will you help to make us patient,
Honest, loving, pure and strong?

"Dear New Year, you'll aid us, won't you?
You are young like us, you know—
As we journey on together
Help us each to stronger grow."

With best wishes,

Aunt Jane

NEPHEWS AND NIECES.

I am a little temperance boy seven years old. My grandma takes THE UNION SIGNAL. I enjoy the children's stories very much. I would like to join the Cozy Corner. I go to school every day. My mamma and grandma belong to the W. C. T. U. ALLIE HEBNER.

Hulberton, N. Y.

Your letter is well written for a seven-year-old boy, and that shows that you are making good use of your precious school days, little nephew.

I am a little girl nine years old. I am staying with my auntie now. She takes THE UNION SIGNAL, and I enjoy reading the Children's page. I always look for the letters of the Cozy Cornerers. I would like to be one of them. Mamma, papa and sister Gertrude belong to the W. C. T. U. and I belong to the L. T. L. What does one have to do to be entitled to a place in the Cozy Corner?

Ellisburg, Pa. GAIL M. NELSON.

You have done all, Gail. Signing the pledge and writing a letter now and then to the Corner makes you a member of our world-wide circle.

This is the first time that I ever wrote o you, and with this you will find a story, and it would please me very much if you would have it printed in the Cozy Corner page. I would like to join the Cozy Corner, may I?

Cherokee, Kan. MAUDIE NUTTER.

We thank you very much for the story, Maude, which was too long to print in our crowded Corner. We are glad to enroll another story writer.

I have never seen a letter from any of your nieces "in black" so I send one. It was my pleasure to hear our dear Miss Willard last month, and I can assure you that I love her just as much as my "sisters in white." She said, "the W. C. T. U. knows no color line" (was not that splendid?) I am a Prohibitionist. ELLA B. CLINTON.

Philadelphia, Pa.

Welcome to our Cozy Corner, Ella. Give her the salute, boys and girls.

Is there any room for me in the Cozy Corner? My mamma takes THE UNION SIGNAL. There is no L. T. L. in our town or I would be a member, but I have signed the temperance pledge. My grandma at Canton is a member of the W. C. T. U. I am ten pears old.

East Canton, Pa. HELEN LAWRENCE.

Of course there is room, little one. Do you know our countersign?

SIGNAL NOTES 16

This one thing I do: forgetting those things which are behind and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press towards the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.—Phil. 3:13, 14.

OUR NEW YEAR'S GREETING.

THE UNION SIGNAL greets its readers, everywhere, with the well-worn yet ever new salutation:—"A Happy New Year." We are glad that, in this rushing age, in this life of intense purpose and constant effort which the majority of us lead, we have not outgrown the old greeting nor the old thought of happiness as an end to be desired.

It is true that Carlyle has taught us that "there is a something greater than happiness. Man can do without happiness, and instead thereof find blessedness"; but, when the Carlylean idea of blessedness is reduced to its essential elements we are sure it will be found to consist largely of happiness raised to its highest power;—the happiness which is won through the renunciation of the self-life and which makes us at one with God, in the very "joy of the Lord."

All true happiness is of God, and none is to be ignored in our manifold life. Therefore we hope for our readers, not only the deep soul-ecstasy which sweeps over us as the breath of the Infinite Himself; not only the gladness which comes from a sense of duty well done and crosses bravely borne: we hope for each also the keen mental delight which comes through contact with great minds, by the written or spoken word: the gladness of music, of beautiful scenes, the delight of happy laughter and merry jest; the companionship of friends with all the simple natural pleasures which make up our human life.

Doubtless there will be trials in each life, but doubtless, also, there will be, if we will but see them, many more joys. When the trials come we wish for each the faith to see God's purpose and to accept His will. When the joys come we wish that faith no less. Sometimes it takes more faith to know God in joy than in sorrow. The theological teaching of past ages has made it hard for us, even now, to believe that He is glad in our gladnesses, and, alas, there are Christians not a few who are ready to accept the miserable creed, that "We should suspect some danger nigh

When we possess delight."

"REJOICE IN THE LORD!" Let us paint that upon our banners for the coming year, and in the name of our God set up those banners.

As white-ribboners, we wish for you the especial gladness of seeing our organization and the great principles for which it stands advance this year as never before. There is a gladness which comes through success, and when the object of effort is such an one as ours, we should seek with all our powers to know that gladness.

If it were permitted to us to lay down a program covering the life of each individual white-ribboner during 1895 that program would come under three classifications:

First: Acquaint yourself as never before with our work and with its underlying principles. Let there be no point upon which you have not some definite knowledge. "Always ready to give a reason for the hope that is within you" is a maxim as important to-day as when Paul uttered it. Intelligent white-ribboners need multiplication. The very reason why so many, comparatively, who wear the white ribbon are without special enthusiasm is because they know so little of the work. We have known a county convention, or a neighborhood meeting, to turn an exceedingly lukewarm member of a local union into an enthusiast of enthusiasts. Why? Because it brought to her for the first time genuine insight. Therefore, learn, "mark, study, inwardly digest"; let no opportunity for acquainting yourself with our work pass unimproved.

Second: Pass on the light. It was not entrusted to you to be placed under a bushel. It was not given solely for your own enlightenment. We hold all the good things of life in trust for others and the essence of our gladness in them consists in bringing others to their knowledge. If you are not an enthusiastic member of the W. C. T. U. set out this New Year's day on a genuine crusade for new members. Make for yourself a "stint" during the coming year. Pledge yourself in the strength of God to secure a certain number of new members before the year shall close, and then set to work for them. If your enthusiasm does not straightway rise to a white heat we shall count you the sole exception to a universal law.

Third: Rely mightily upon God. His are the issues of the conflict. His is the power which giveth victory. True, He works through means and chooses human instrumentalities. The "Word made flesh" is evermore the divine method of working out the divine purposes.

Nevertheless, while we should push the battle to the gates along all our lines of organization, education, prevention, evangelization, social and legal work; while we should work as if upon our prowess solely depended the ultimate victory, we still believe that we should go back to a greater degree than for many past years to the thought which was the seed-germ of our organization,—that God will reveal His mighty arm for the overthrow of the liquor system. Let the noontide hour of prayer come with its divine hush into our busiest days. Let the prayer-meeting be as much a feature of our work as the business meeting. Let the prayer spirit permeate the business meeting itself, and verily we shall have a year rich in results, which tend to the inbringing of righteousness.

THE UNION SIGNAL'S NEW YEAR.

We have not many promises to make for the New Year, except that we will try to be at least as "good" as we were last year. Our behavior depends to such a considerable degree upon the pledges of our subscribers and the redemption of the same, that our New Year's editorial should properly be written after the renewal of subscriptions takes place in January.

While not permitting the literary tone of the paper to deteriorate a particle we are desirous that THE UNION SIGNAL should become more and more the mouthpiece and promoter of the W. C. T. U. To this end we have established the department of the LOCAL UNION, and have other features in mind which will be introduced during the year. This LOCAL UNION corner is one to which every white-ribboner is warmly welcomed. It is meant to be the hive of the workers, and will be so conducted that every woman who loves the W. C. T. U. and has its highest interests at heart, will feel so much at home that she will not be at all timid about speaking her mind freely on all subjects that concern the work in her own locality. Many a local president and superintendent has a difficulty which needs solution by a more experienced head, but she feels diffident about troubling an officer who is overrun with letters and questions. Such an one need have no fear of thus troubling "Mother Experience," who has kindly consented to take charge of the LOCAL UNION department. She is not so wise in her own conceit that she believes she can solve every difficulty and answer every knotty question infallibly, but she knows, or will find out, just where to go for the very best solution, as that is her business.

We also want suggestions from the local membership everywhere for the conduct of this and other departments of the paper, and so far as they are adaptable to our circumstances we will be glad to put them into execution.

For the next two months we want to push the POLYGLOT PETITION as it has never been pushed before in this country. Unions that are looking for the "next thing to do" will here find their answer: Secure signatures to the Polyglot Petition. Carry two or three copies in your bag, and wherever you go, ask your friends to sign their names. This Petition is a popular one, and you will not receive a refusal once in a hundred times. THE UNION SIGNAL will keep the Petition standing at the head of the first editorial page. It can be cut out, pasted neatly on white paper, and the signatures attached below. This plan is suggested to save trouble to our friends. A neater and more systematic list of names can be secured by sending for the regular Petition blanks to the corresponding secretary of the National W. C. T. U., Mrs. Katharine Lente Stevenson, Room 1114, The Temple, Chicago. This address is given for the present only, and to help in the pushing of the Petition work during January and February. There is a special reason for pushing the Petition just now, which will be announced later to our readers. We can only say that a very interesting plan is under way, and that the names on the Petition will soon be shown up in a most creditable fashion.

It is a humiliating fact that the white-ribboners of the United States have not worked for the Petition, in proportion to their numbers, as well as those of any other nation. We have not yet touched even the outer edge of a real effort to gain signatures. If every W. C. T. U. woman knew as well as those at Headquarters know how dear the interests of this Great Petition are to the heart of our Chieftain, she would not hesitate to do her part in lengthening the list. We know positively that nothing would be so great a comfort and gratification to Miss Willard as the satisfactory completion of a canvass for signatures throughout the United States before the Petition starts on its long and unique journey around the world. Are we all ready?

THE "NEW DOCTRINE."

There lies on our desk a pamphlet from Australia, wherein, as the title page indicates, the "New Doctrine of Total Abstinence" is "examined" by Rev. George Tait, M. A., of South Yarra. In a series of ten letters (previously issued in the Presbyterian Monthly), the author gives an exposition of his views on the temperance question—views which seem to have created no little stir among temperance workers in that wide-awake colony.

The remarkable feature about these views is that they emanate from one who both advocates and practices total abstinence. He explains his rather anomalous position by saying that he urges total abstinence, not because he would annihilate the drink traffic, but because it is in his opinion the best and quickest way to attain an ideal moderation in the use of intoxicants.

The "New Doctrine" taught by modern temperance advocates is based, he declares, "not on the Scriptural grounds (1) of avoiding everything however lawful in itself which injures or endangers the higher life, or (2) of giving up for the sake of others a good thing which you have a right to use, but on the ground that the use of fermented liquors is a sin, a violation of the sixth commandment." This principle he holds to be radically false, "condemned alike by science and by Scripture"; and with this introduction he marshals before the reader in battle array the arguments supporting the so-called new doctrine and proceeds to demolish them.

First are examined the arguments from science. While warmly commending the total abstinence movement for its "successful challenge, not only of popular notions but also of medical teaching regarding the use of alcohol," he criticizes the temperance societies for "carrying their theories too far." While admitting that people are injured by drink without being drunkards, he maintains that a certain amount of alcohol is beneficial. In short, he finds "no foundation in science for total abstinence for any large number of people."

We do not forget, however, that other men, whose capacity for scientific investigation is fully as great as that of Mr. Tait or any authority he quotes, do find abundant reason for universal total abstinence. As Mr. Gladstone

—a sincere Christian, and Sir Andrew Clarke, his late physician, are especially pointed out as holding and practicing the scientific and scriptural doctrine concerning the use of fermented drinks, we give here a statement of Sir Andrew's views: "This state (health) cannot be benefited by alcohol in any degree. I will go further and say that it is injured by alcohol, that even in small doses it will take off the mental and moral bloom. . . . Alcohol upsets the stomach, the stomach upsets the other organs, and bit by bit under a fair, jovial outside the constitution is sapped."

The proper quantity to use, says Mr. Tait, must be determined by the physical condition of the individual and his surroundings. But, says Sir Andrew Clarke—the reverend gentleman's own selected authority—"So soon as a man begins to take one drop, then the desire begotten in him becomes a part of his nature, and that nature inflicts curses inexpressible when handed down to generations that follow him, as part and parcel of their being. When I think of this, I am disposed to give up my profession—to give up everything and go forth upon a holy crusade to preach to all men, Beware of this enemy of the race."

Mr. Tait maintains that alcohol is a product of nature and one of God's good gifts to man. To arrest fermentation, he says, is to wage war against nature, and produce an artificial drink—just what the temperance people declare fermented beverages to be. Without stopping to point out the distinction between the application of art to nature and the perversion of nature itself, both of which may be brought about by the ingenuity of man, we will only suggest that there are certain natural forces—natural at least in the "fallen" condition of creation—against which man must wage incessant warfare. Would Mr. Tait say that, because the ground in a state of nature brings forth thorns and thistles, therefore we should regard them as good gifts of God, and refrain from arresting their development? Does he object on scientific grounds to the tiller of the soil applying what art he may possess in the cultivation of that more artificial product, the golden grain?

Summarizing what he audaciously calls the "accepted conclusions" of science, Mr. Tait finds that alcohol, though unnecessary and dangerous as a food, as an "occasional luxury may be used without injury, with proper regard to time and quantity." The question, then, to be considered, is, how near can a given person approach the danger line and not overstep it? Which might be illustrated by another: "How near can a given person get to the small-pox and not take it?" Until that is decided Mr. Tait thinks it safest for everybody to be "teetotalers."

The scientific argument disposed of the author attacks, with evident relish, the Biblical. The two-wine theory is characterized as a "supposed discovery," made to reconcile the "new doctrine" with the teaching and example of Christ. Twenty-two pages, or four letters, are devoted to "proving" that there is in modern times, and that there was in ancient, only one kind of wine, and that, of course, the fermented. It is not necessary to enlarge upon the manifest absurdity of this claim, when the veriest child knows that it is from the unfermented, or new wine, that the fermented is made. It is obviously impossible to produce the latter without first producing the former. For further refutation of the one-wine theory we refer our readers to the exposition of Rev. Mr. Knowles, under the title "Leavened Wine," on page 6 of this issue.

But the most astounding argument Mr. Tait advances in support of his moderation theory is that alcohol is a means of grace! "The right use of alcohol," he argues, "requires more self-control, more exercise of intelligence and conscience than total abstinence"; and "to keep intelligence and conscience alive and active in the building of character is the main object of the gospel," therefore moderate use of intoxicants promotes the "supreme aim of Christianity."

According to this logic we should pray, "Lead us into temptation"; we should seek opportunity to "stand in the way of sinners"; in short, we should seek hand-to-hand conflicts with the devil as effectual means for the upbuilding of character.

The final letter of the series informs us "how the new doctrine hinders temperance reform." "Ominous signs," we are told, "point to a retrogression of the temperance movement, and close observers in America are coming to the same conclusion." Now the closest observers of any movement are, first, those who plan the campaign, and second, the leaders of the opposition. Mr. Tait evidently does not place much reliance upon the statements of the former, but we suggest that if he take time to familiarize himself with the opinions of liquor dealers as set forth in their journals he will be better informed as to which way the signs are pointing.

The doctrine of radical temperance leaders to-day—Mr. Tait may call it "new" if he chooses—is that the use of alcoholic beverages is, not a violation of any specific Commandment, but a violation of the spirit of the whole Decalogue—which is love to God and to our neighbor.

OUR CHIEFTAINS' MOVEMENTS.

Lady Henry Somerset and Miss Willard have been studying voice culture with Mrs. Milward Adams, of the Auditorium, Chicago, who has classes in Cambridge and Boston. Mrs. Adams went east by invitation of Mrs. Ole Bull, who is well known as the originator of so many helpful and delightful enterprises for the upbuilding of those about her in all that pertains to high thinking and true living. In connection with the lessons referred to there have been brief addresses by Lady Henry Somerset, Miss Willard, Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, Colonel Higginson and others. Our two leaders have also spoken at the opening of the Woman's Suffrage fair in Boston, and the New England Club, that famous prototype of the best clubs in this country. They are to participate in a birthday surprise to be given to Mrs. Mary A. Livermore by the Salem Woman's Club of which Kate Tannett Woods is president, and Lady Somerset is to speak for the Melrose W. C. T. U. in a few days. On January 18 and 20 the two ladies go to New York to speak in Carnegie Hall under the auspices of the Y of which Mrs. Frances J. Barnes is the head, also in Poughkeepsie and at Vassar College. Later they speak for Mrs. Stevens before the legislature in Augusta, Maine, in the interests of woman's municipal ballot and still later at Hartford, Connecticut, for Mrs. Forbes and for Mrs. Quigley—daughter of Mrs. Downs—at Orange, on which occasion they are to be guests in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Edison. They also speak for the Y and the W in Philadelphia and go to Washington to attend the Women's Council in February. These are some of the salient points in the comings and goings of our chieftains, whose every moment is devoted to the advancement of the principles of the white ribbon army. It goes without saying that Anna Gordon is their "staff and stay," and knows more about what they are set to do than they know themselves. We are glad to be able to report the health of the trio as remarkably good and the outlook most encouraging.

At first thought many good people will be shocked by the suggestion made in the annual address of the president of the National W. C. T. U., that women should be introduced as members of the police force. As a matter of course it was not expected that this would be done in large cities at present, but the recommendation was made that in Colorado, Wyoming, New Zealand and other parts of the world where women are not only citizens, but voters, the experiment should be tried in the smaller towns and villages, and it was meant that women should go out two by two and that they should be selected by a representative committee of the best women in the community, and should be of matronly age, appearance and character. With these safeguards we feel confident that great advantage would come from having women thus represented. The present movement in Chicago and other cities to totally separate the police department from politics would be perhaps a necessary preliminary to the participation of women. But when one thinks of it, the futility of expecting that a police force composed of men will array itself adequately against the pleasures of other men is demonstrated in all our cities, and has been for centuries. If strong and trusty women were detailed to patrol those parts of any town or village where saloons, gambling dens or houses of infamy are located, there is no doubt but that the mother instinct in them would lead them to do their work thoroughly. Their very presence would make it so difficult for profligate men who still retained some shreds of reputation to enter these traps and gins that the revenues of intemperance and shame would be reduced to a minimum. The same is true of uncleanly places of so-called "amusement." The streets of cities will never be really safe for women until other women help to make them so. The midnight sections of Sodom in our great cities would be cleared up in a twelvemonth if reputable women, commissioned by the municipality, were put on duty there; let it be, however, perfectly understood that the suggestion of women policemen is made with such provisions carefully hedging it round about as ought to defend it from severe criticism in these days when it has been ascertained that the metropolitan police, to say the least of it, are in collusion with any institution or group of evil-doers from whom they can, in addition to the salary paid them by the public, obtain that which is their soul's desire—abundant "hush money."

We are grieved to learn of the sudden death of Rev. Dr. W. C. Willing, of New York city, husband of Mrs. Jane Fowler Willing, who was so prominently identified with our work in its initial stages. In a private note Miss Mary Lathbury writes as follows: "Dr. Willing died very suddenly of heart disease while acting as counsel for a minister in a church trial. He had just had his arm around two ministers, saying, 'I love my brethren,' when his head dropped and he was gone. They had just come into the possession of a large mission chapel and house in West Thirty-second street, and the first service in the chapel was the doctor's funeral. Mrs. Willing will go on with the mission. I am heartsick for her, but as for him I give him joy."

We call these times hard and so they are, but nevertheless a million and a half of dollars will be expended on the opera in New York city this season, of which the managers will make a clear half million of profit.

A pair of twins was born in the Back Bay district. A bright boy set about to try to name them. He said, "Will they be called Peter and Repeater?" But no; his mother would not listen to the name Peter. Then he said, "Let them be called Max and Climax." "No," she said, "they are both little girls so we cannot name one of them Max." Then he said after much thought, "Let them be called Kate and Duplicate." After that his head was bandaged and he was sent out to play.

It is an omen of good that the president of Harvard University has recently called together all the colleges and philanthropic societies in that great institution, and with other leaders has been planning with the students active Christian work for the winter. The method is to have a central committee representing each society, and to this committee come the young men students who are willing to give a certain amount of time to religious and philanthropic work. They are then assigned according to their preferences, and there is a fair division of work among the different lines, and a classified and well reasoned effort instead of the helter-skelter method which has so long prevailed in most lines of charitable effort. We wish this key-note, set high up on the octave, might be caught by every theological seminary, college and institution where our young people are being trained throughout the land. Cannot the W. C. T. U. help to cause "an arrest of thought" in some wise heads on this subject?

"Folks must be taught as though you taught them not,
And things remembered told as things forgot."

Since the temperance reform began its work in earnest in this country the amount of alcoholic liquor annually used has risen from seven to seventeen gallons per capita.

Ex-Secretary Whitney says the trouble with this country is too much silver and too much tariff. White-ribboners say the trouble is too much alcoholic drink. The fact is, the women spend their money for dry goods and the men for wet goods, or in other words, extravagance and indulgence are the two roots of the upas tree that casts its poisonous blight upon the nation. All the silver in this country, the result of centuries of gathering up of filthy lucre, would not meet the drink bill of a single year; $1,600,000,000 this year for liquor and tobacco.

I wonder what would be the result if the Russian plan of punishing drunkenness were adopted in England and the United States. Under the order of General Wahl, governor of St. Petersburg, all persons found upon the streets in a disorderly or intoxicated condition have their names and addresses printed on large posters and publicly displayed at certain points in the city and are also published in the official journal. No privileged person is exempt. On one of these lists of one hundred and twenty-seven names all classes in societies are found represented. As a means of "regulation" this object lesson sort of public punishment may be efficacious in the less hardened cases. Shall we hope for its introduction?

Some bright young man or woman seeking a way into the world's activities might imitate a method recently adopted by our white ribbon sisters across the water, under the auspices of Mrs. Osborn, superintendent of the speakers' bureau in the B. W. T. A. A lantern lecture has been prepared, the subject being "The Origin and History of the Women's Temperance Movement." Lady Henry Somerset has written the lecture to accompany the lantern slides, and any local union can hire these slides and give an exhibition, appointing some one who is capable of doing it to render the lecture from type-written notes. As a matter of course there are many other subjects than the one we mention, that could be delightfully illustrated, and by having the lecture commentary furnished by distinguished persons the lecture would be much more popular. Illustrations can now be had of the "seamy side" of life in our great cities as well as in those of England, and by introducing a variety of pictures the interest would be greatly enhanced. Here is an unworked field of practically illimitable possibilities and one that takes only a quick mind and skilled hand to work it successfully for the cause and for the individual who does the work.

A VOICE FROM MANITOBA.

The old cry of agitate, agitate, agitate, has been acted upon with such good effect that a step forward has been taken, resulting in the many petitions which the legislatures of the country are confronted with.

Recently in Quebec, the Dominion Alliance, through their president, Mr. J. R. Dougall, laid before the Quebec Provincial legislature a petition asking that provision be made for taking a plebiscite in this province on the question of prohibiting the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors. Of a somewhat different nature, but leading to the same end by another road, was the petition presented by the W. C. T. U. to the Eastern Maritime Prohibitionists' meeting in convention in Annapolis, N. S., asking that woman suffrage should form a plank in their platform. After an animated discussion the question was adopted.

Yet a third petition is now being circulated asking the legislature of Quebec to "be pleased to enact a law whereby no licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors shall be granted to any grocer or other person engaged in any other kind of business whatever."

Incited probably by so much energy on the part of the opposition, the liquor sellers and their friends put their heads together and concocted a production which even the newspapers, that as a rule befriend the liquor business, stigmatized as "unwise." One sentence will show its drift as effectually as a more lengthy quotation. Legislature is asked to discourage or suppress "bodies bearing the name of alliances and others which organize themselves into groups of noisy character and assume the prerogatives of guardians of the public morals, as social reformers, or as apostles of temperance." Every sentence betrays the weakness of the cause the petition advocates, and yet it is signed by many respectable persons who are fighting hard to have their darling sin recognized as one of the necessary industries of the country.

The Ontario Provincial W. C. T. U. have recently held their seventeenth annual convention. Cornwall was the scene of action, and all speak highly of the earnestness and enthusiasm which marked the proceedings. For four days the work went on, report after report telling of what has been steadily done through the year in the different departments. Interesting as all these reports were, it is impossible to go into them at any length. Those on work among lumbermen, soldiers and railroad men were most encouraging. Among the former, 1,145 men had been reached, 34 meetings held, 26 shanties and six families visited. Such work as this is much needed, there being from 15,000 to 20,000 men in those lumber camps shut off from the outside world and all religious influences.

The president's address showed evidence of careful preparation. The review of the year's work was excellent, and a strong appeal in favor of the extension of the franchise to women was made. This was followed up later by a paper written by Mrs. Edwards, of Ottawa, on "The Ballot for Women," and an animated discussion on "Woman's Suffrage," limited to five minute addresses, after which a resolution was passed to the effect that the franchise should not be limited to one sex, and that civil, religious and political rights were meant for and should be enjoyed equally by both sexes.

Dr. Anna Shaw, of Boston, in her Thursday evening lecture, also put in a strong plea for the franchise to women. Her eloquent address held the close attention of an immense audience for an hour and a half.

The corresponding secretary showed that in the Province there had been reported 211 unions with 5,523 active and 704 honorary members; that during the year 2,756 unions and 748 public meetings had been held; that there are 89 Bands of Hope with 8,532 members; there are of the members of the union 569 voters on municipal questions. During the year the union raised $10,013, distributed 688 copies of the annual report and 416,122 pages of literature. Twenty-eight unions have been organized.

The treasurer's report showed that the total income of the union during the year was $3,043 and the expenditure $2,559, leaving an encouraging balance on hand of $484.

A spirited contest took place over the election of office bearers, the result being that all were reëlected.

In the memorial service special reference was made to the death of Mrs. Fawcett, formerly Provincial president and Dominion president for one year, 1890. Mrs. Fawcett's sweet, loving spirit and faithful performance of duties, however slight, endeared her to all who worked with her or knew her.

Much sympathy has been extended to Mrs. Todd, Dominion vice-president, in her recent bereavement, the loss of her husband. On account of the illness of her daughter, Mrs. Todd will spend the winter in Boston.

Mrs. MacGillis of Winnipeg sends a report of W. C. T. U. work done in Manitoba, permeated with the fresh, breezy atmosphere so generally associated with the northwest.

In Winnipeg she says there are now three unions—the South End, which has not been long in existence but is working with enthusiasm, the Central and the Y.

Central Union has a membership of over one hundred and fifty. At the Midsummer Fair temperance tents were a great success, for in addition to the opportunity thus afforded of talking to many people from all over the province and lessening the power of temptation, a fair sum was netted after expenses were paid.

A new and special feature of the Central Union is the "Letter to the New Member," which is placed in the hand of every member, especially newcomers, and which defines the duties and points out the privileges of a member, showing how all may help in one or other of the many departments of work.

The winter's program now distributed is full and interesting. Mothers' meetings conducted by Dr. Amelia Yeomans will be held monthly, and with the paper and discussion following will take up all the time of that afternoon. The other Mondays will be devoted half to business and half to Bible study and the reading of papers, interspersed with suitable music. The "Physiology of the Corset" was the subject of the first mothers' meeting, a large and interested audience bearing testimony to the fact that the ill-used corset, so often fatal to health and beauty, is now receiving scientific scrutiny and will practically be abolished or fall into its proper place in woman's dress, that of support and not constraint.

The Y's have moved their reading-room for girls into new quarters and are preparing for an active winter's campaign. They recently tendered a reception to the Normal students, of whom about one hundred attended. These students remain in Winnipeg for five months and then are scattered all over the country; in this way the good seed is carried to every corner of the province.

The recent Provincial convention made some change in the personnel of Provincial officers, but all over the Province work is going on most harmoniously and vigorously.

Brandon has two unions, a W and a Y. On October 25 the Provincial treasurer addressed a combined meeting of these unions on "Some of America's Famous Women." The Y's intend going extensively into the work of the Loyal Temperance Legion this winter for which Brandon affords ample scope, having over five hundred school children in the town.

Morden union also intend emphasizing juvenile work this winter and are anxious for the introduction of the Curfew Bell, which is said to be having a good effect in towns in Ontario where it is now law. They also take an active interest in the town hospital in which they have furnished a ward.

Manitou union is one of the most active in the Province. They have the best temperance library in Manitoba, containing one hundred and eighty volumes at present. They have also a fine Loyal Temperance Legion.

Souris union has opened a reading room for the benefit of the young men of the town, on which they have already expended over thirty dollars on papers and periodicals.

Portage La Prairie has also a flourishing union doing good practical work.

Mrs. MacGillis says this is far from a full account of the W. C. T. U. work in Manitoba, as from some unions she has been unable to get reports, and those that were sent have been condensed to briefest outlines. Enough, however, has been shown to prove that Manitoba is alive to the fact that if she wishes to rear "brave men and fair women" the drink curse must be banished from her fair borders.

MASSACHUSETTS MATTERS.

Thanksgiving is over once more in New England. The land of turkeys and mince pies and doughnuts (which really must be good for brains) has poured out her annual increase. The governor's message was worthy of the old home of the Puritan, and the real descendants have been loyal and true in the observance of time-honored customs.

Whether we see them or not, we are most comfortably content to know that Lady Henry Somerset and Frances E. Willard, LL. D., are domiciled at the Hub, the center of the universe, the axis of all revolution. We are glad that any day we can walk across the Common, through the Public Gardens, up Commonwealth Avenue a way, ring the bell at the Abbotsford, and there they are! As bright and brilliant and beautifully poised a pair of leaders as ever represented the hemispheres. They may not be quite so near heaven as in your Temple sky parlors, but they are on the most solid earth the sun shines upon—the solid earth of Boston. We shall be careful of them, never fear! But you must understand, you from the north and south and even the west, that their curriculum of knowledge and power and experience will not be complete until they have learned how we do it in Boston.

They come to us in the thick of our annual no-license struggle. What a theme for the future historian, these conflicts with the liquor traffic and the liquor politician! These rallies for the illumination of the conscience of the voter, and the abolition of the saloon! All over the state our local unions have been giving themselves to this special work. The W. C. T. U., the Christian Endeavor societies, the Total Abstinence society, the Evangelistic Association and some pastors and churches have, to a degree, adjourned the consideration of other questions and entered vigorously into this campaign. The Boston Christian Endeavor Union in particular has made a good fight, bringing John G. Woolley from his unceasing labors to administer his most pointed and telling strokes; also Rev. A. J. Wheeler, Law and Order League secretary, New Hampshire, a new, or more recent, Daniel come to judgment. The president of the leading liquor organization of New Hampshire said of one of his meetings, "The recent debate in Concord has injured the traffic in this state more than twenty years of legislation." In these days when some of the ministers—a very few it is hoped—are subsidized to a system of license, such valiant helpers are especially prized.

"There were naturally more women than men to hear Lady Henry Somerset at the no-license rally in East Cambridge," remarked one of our Boston dailies. We look and pray for the day when men and women will become naturalized to the highest interests of home and children, of peaceful and law-abiding communities. Twenty large cities expressed themselves on this question last week, with the following result: Brockton, Fitchburg, Haverhill, Malden, Newton, Quincy, Somerville voted "No." The other thirteen have chosen to have the saloon in their midst. The grand public schools of this commonwealth, under the law of scientific temperance instruction, have over against them the legalized saloon, an antidote to law. Such is the consistency of government in these municipalities. Pittsfield, a city of seventeen thousand, against license last year, voted "Yes" this, while Haverhill, twenty-seven thousand, changed to "No." On the whole, there has been, according to Rev. Alfred Noon, a net gain (small) for license. To-day Boston is making her record on this question, and before this report is finished the verdict will be announced.

Another question at issue to-day is the election of a school committee, in which women have a voice. Over eleven thousand have registered. The independent women voters, with their intrepid leader, Mrs. Eliza Trask Hill, and the committee of one hundred, concur in a ticket nominated. The Republicans refused to accept four of their nominees, because, well, they were not Republicans pure and simple. And this reminds me of the reasons given in one of our papers a few weeks since why a certain candidate should be supported for Congress:

"I should vote for him because he is and always has been an active, earnest and aggressive Republican.

"I should support him because he is the regular nominee of the Republican party.

"I should support him because he is always ready to battle for the Republican party.

"I should support him because I want a Republican sent to Congress.

"I should support him because I cannot find any reason why as a Republican I should help to seat a Democrat."

There is something especially hopeful in the outlook these days because of the work that is being done individually for the cause of righteousness. For months, years, almost, Mrs. Alice Lincoln has been quietly pushing a work for the poor and despised of Boston. This has been done without any special indorsement except as earnest men and women, and occasionally the press, have noted and appreciated her efforts. Recently, however, a public expression of this appreciation has been given by a gathering of Boston women—women not commonly associated with reform. Naturally Lady Henry Somerset might be there, but not so much so the conservatives. Mrs. Chas. G. Ames, in introducing Mrs. Lincoln, said: "Any man or woman who attacks an established wrong has a cross to bear." To which sentiment the W. C. T. U. can say, "Amen." Mrs. Lincoln's address was on the "Reform of Institutions for Paupers," and much of it has been copied in newspapers abroad. England and Germany are said to be in advance in this matter, but there is no doubt that what was said applies to other American cities as truly as to Boston.

The Norwegian system keeps coming to the front and one thing is accomplished anyway—more people are inquiring and thoughtful on the subject of temperance and the question of "systems." The Congregational club discussed it the other evening, and good must have been done because of the unsoundness of the arguments for, as compared with the strength and statistics of the reply.

Mrs. A. J. Gordon, so long and so actively associated with the Boston union, has resigned as its president, and Mrs. Emily L. McLaughlin, a sister of Rev. R. R. Meredith, of Brooklyn, and one of our foremost workers, has been chosen for the position. Mrs. Gordon reviewed her fifteen years of service at the annual meeting. She "wanted to go out quietly and unostentatiously, without any tears, resolutions, or obituaries." I shall not write one because we hope and expect that her prayers and sympathy and effort will still be given to the work.

The Massachusetts W. C. T. U., Mrs. S. S. Fessenden, president, expects to "receive" Lady Henry Somerset in true American fashion at a banquet to be held in Music Hall the evening of January 3. Particulars of this hearty, public, popular welcome will be given in my next communication. Old England, through this beloved representative, is already enshrined in New England, and none so poor as not to delight to do her honor.

The Massachusetts Union has also arranged for a course of lectures on "Social Problems," to be given in January and February by Prof. J. H. W. Stuckenberg, formerly of Berlin. Prof. Stuckenberg and his wife are now of Cambridge, returning to this country after a residence of fourteen years in Germany, during which time they have won a host of friends in America by their reception and kindness to American students in Berlin, of which there are on an average four hundred yearly. The professor has long been a student of social reform and is an expert upon this question.

Later—Election day is over and eleven more cities, including Boston, have recorded their vote. Cambridge by a majority of 4,500 continues to emphasize her opposition to the saloon; Chelsea, also, after a brave fight, every ward saying "no" except two. Boston's majority for license is 11,799, an increase of 2,055 over last year. The papers have said that it would cost the city of Boston $1,000,000 income if it should vote "no-license"; that "it is a practical matter"; that "the traffic in intoxicating liquors, intertwined as it is with trade and commerce, generally serves the best purpose under license, and no other disposition of the question promotes the interest of large and populous communities."

PROGRESS ALL ALONG THE LINE.

In the hasty penning of the account of our state convention, the reporter omitted mention of the fact that our faithful and efficient former correspondent, Miss Eva Jones, was compelled by the illness of her parents to relinquish this part of her work, and therefore another was appointed to the position. Press reporters for unions are requested to note the change.

Several communications relating to successful district conventions have been received. The St. Louis convention was preceded by a large and enthusiastic anti-cigarette meeting. In the convention several very interesting papers were read, and Mrs. Waggoner in a short address protested against the exhibition of living pictures at the exposition. The president, Mrs. Ingalls, reviewed statistics showing how closely the whisky and tobacco habits were interlinked. Companies A and B of the L. T. L. enlivened the routine work with their songs and recitations, and a musical and literary program was furnished by the Y. W. C. T. U., which was greatly enjoyed. A fine address by Geo. W. Bain, a reading by Mrs. F. S. Haskell and responsive exercises closed "one of the best conventions ever held."

From the sixteenth district, Mrs. Lena Mummert, president, comes word of helpful and inspiring sessions. A pleasant departure was a reception tendered the delegates, where addresses of welcome and sweet music were followed by light refreshments, served by the young ladies. The closing address was by Mrs. Sophie Grubb, who held the close attention of an appreciative audience.

Miss Terrell, secretary of the thirteenth district, sends an admirable résumé of the gathering of the clans in that district, Mrs. M. E. Golladay, president. Every union in the district was represented by delegates or written reports, and a spirit of earnestness and strict attention to business prevailed. Mrs. Hoffman gave a fine lecture one evening, and a reception to delegates and visitors was held on the second evening. The feeling of love and good-fellowship which had pervaded the whole session had full sway here and all were cheered and encouraged.

I glean from the notes of the McDonald county W. C. T. U. that the plan of appointing a vice-president in each unorganized township, and through her distributing literature, is yielding good results.

Sedalia union recently held a very successful gospel temperance meeting. Dr. Cool delivered an eloquent address on "St. George and the Dragon." His application—the liquor traffic the dragon; St. George, the young voter, casting and influencing votes for the right, and the lovely daughter of the king standing with upraised hands pleading to heaven for safety from the approaching monster; the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, with its prayerful women, working and pleading for help to put down the liquor traffic. Miss Carter was present and gave an excellent short talk.

Pleasant Valley reports a delightful lawn party, with program of recitations, dialogues, etc.; two of the members gave reasons why women belong, and why they do not belong to the union—which were quite entertaining. Refreshments and an art gallery completed the evening's merry-making.

Pineville W. C. T. U. has held a young men's silver medal contest, Thomas Clemons winning the medal. Excellent music was furnished, and the evening's entertainment was enjoyed by all present.

Anderson union proves its faith by its works in furnishing a fine program of recitations, songs and addresses for its last temperance mass-meeting.

Adrian union is doing aggressive work along department lines, has a membership of forty-five regular and five honorary members, and the L. T. L. under its charge numbers eighty-three and is in a flourishing condition. On membership day the president appointed a committee composed of the three oldest members, aged respectively seventy, seventy-seven, and seventy-eight years, to solicit new members. The mass-meeting in the evening was very interesting with musical and literary program, and was largely attended. This union acts on the motto, "It's dogged as does it."

Another union which is sowing the seed faithfully is Prohibition union; an instructive program is prepared and as there is a good attendance of non-members they are hopeful of a steady increase in numbers and interest. The voting precinct in which this union is located gave in the November election the largest prohibition vote in the county.

Maryville W. C. T. U. proposes to keep the temperance work before the public, so times and seasons are studied and popular entertainments and lectures are skillfully sandwiched in between the entertainments of the various churches and societies. On Miss Willard's birthday the mass-meeting was opened by Dr. Bentley, presiding elder of the district, with a short sketch of the beneficent results accruing from the Crusade. This was followed by impersonations of prominent American and foreign leaders, which was very fine. Some of the characters represented were Frances E. Willard, Lady Henry Somerset, Pundita Ramabai, Isabel Gibson, Mary C. Leavitt and Chika Sakurai. An original poem, written for the occasion by Mrs. A. Craig, was well received, and from invocation to benediction, including collection, the entire execution of the program was a success. More recently this union held an elocutionary contest for "sweet charity's sake." The participants were married ladies who were arrayed in antique costumes and caps or bonnets of ancient style, and with glasses and powdered hair, made very fine looking old ladies. "A Great Mother" was awarded the successful contestant, Mrs. J. M. P. Martin. The character song, "Reuben and Rachel," was charmingly rendered by a little girl and boy attired in the quaint garb of the old time orthodox Quakers. The closing exercise was the "anthropophone," which consisted of a sheet of muslin with lines and bars of black representing sheet music, the faces of twelve singers filling the notes of "Annie Laurie." This number was greatly enjoyed by the audience.

The superintendent of Kirkwood Y's, Mrs. Belle Kimball, writes of a delightful musical and parlor meeting held November 23, at which six new members were gained.

Mrs. Hoffman is visiting different points in Texas.

NEW YORK STATE NEWS.

The busy days have been flying past since I wrote my last letter to THE UNION SIGNAL, and the material for another has been rapidly accumulating. The Illuminator, published in Schenectady, brings me a report of the annual convention of held in that city in the rooms of the Y. M. C. A. There is a "persistency" on the part of the workers there which means success and advance. Reports were all excellent. By vote the address of welcome and response were published, as was also the president's address. Several pastors assisted in the exercises, giving encouragement, the speaker of the evening being Rev. C. A. Alden. A parliamentary drill was held the second morning and ringing resolutions were adopted.

The ninth annual convention of

was held at Norway, where every preparation had been made for their coming. The regular convention business was promptly carried forward, and at the evening session Rev. Stanley Roberts, of Utica, held the close attention of the large audience for more than an hour, the subject of his address being "Good Citizenship." The election on the morning of the second day resulted in some changes being made. Excellent reports and papers filled up the time and from beginning to close not a moment went to waste. Ilion, of this county, has had rich treats of late in listening to John G. Woolley and Clara Hoffman.

CORTLAND COUNTY

held its ninth annual meeting at Cincinnatus, eight unions of the eleven being represented. Although this county has not been heard of in some time, yet it is not idle or inactive by any means. Mrs. Mary J. Weaver was present and delivered an evening address, beside being helpful during the day sessions. A startling fact which was brought out was, that in the village of Cincinnatus, with not over 1,500 inhabitants, $4,000 was spent last year for tobacco! Alas, the amount that goes up in smoke! A review of W. C. T. U. work was given by Mrs. Julia Tanner, beginning with the first meeting in Chautauqua, which was well received. The old officers were nearly all reëlected. The need of an organizer is felt in this county, and as Mrs. Weaver is to go through the county soon, great results are hoped for. The fourteenth annual convention of

was held at Pike. A goodly number were present notwithstanding the pouring rain of the first day. Miss Manning, the president, called the convention to order. A cordial welcome was given by Mrs. Mary Vaughn, of Pike, and also several local pastors. The response was given by Mrs. Alberta E. Mead, of Hermitage. The president then gave the annual address. The corresponding secretary's report was followed by a paper on "Scientific Temperance Instruction," by Miss Mary Moore, of Attica, superintendent. At the evening session Miss Manning delivered a very interesting address entitled, "Measuring Day." In place of the usual memorial services, Mrs. Clorinda Butler, of Perry Center, conducted a thanksgiving service as no member of the unions had been removed by death during the past year. A very interesting paper on "Narcotics" was then read by Dr. Mary Green, of Pike. The address of the last evening was "Deborah in the Battle," and the speaker, Mrs. Ella A. Boole, A. M., who was listened to with intense interest by the large audience which filled the church.

Among the items of especial interest in the reports were the facts that seven towns in Wyoming county have no license; $300 has been raised for various purposes; 36 petitions have been circulated, securing about 3,000 signatures; 8,467 pages of literature have been distributed; 74 public and evangelistic meetings held; there have been four Demorest medal contests, and the L. T. L. has 227 pledged members.

FULTON COUNTY

met in convention in the old historic town, Johnstown. Every union in the county was represented, and a large number of visitors were present also. A tender memorial service was held in memory of their county treasurer, who only a few days previous had passed over the river. This county has been peculiarly unfortunate, having lost both county president and treasurer within a year.

An experience meeting was especially helpful to all. Dr. Anna Shaw had charge of the question box, which is a sufficient guarantee that this part of the program was both amusing and instructive. Her evening address was something to be remembered, and will be. Rescue work has been taken up and a Home is to be established at Gloversville.

ONTARIO COUNTY

is not often heard from and I am glad to have a good convention report from them now. The meeting was held at Reeds Corners. This place is noted for its medal contests, having held eight silver and one gold contest, beside doing active service in department work. The county has about two hundred members, Geneva taking the banner for membership. A "welcome" came from the Endeavor Society which was greatly appreciated, and a wish expressed that the two societies may come into closer fellowship. Clifton Springs is a no-license town and its children are being educated where there are no open saloons.

Nearly every union is in a good condition—one or two need encouragement, but all will pull together for victory. Mrs. M. M. Allen was the evening speaker. The county lacks only a few dollars of the one hundred which shall place the name of the late Mrs. E. M. J. Decker on a tablet in Willard Hall.

WARREN COUNTY

held its sixth annual meeting at Bolton, and a good delegation was present from nearly every union. The pastors of the different churches and visiting temperance workers gave words of encouragement and rich experience. Fifteen superintendents reported and the local unions showed an increase in interest and membership. A beautiful county banner has been secured and was presented by Mrs. Tritton to the Mission union of Glens Falls for the greatest increase in membership. Mrs. Saylor, of Glens Falls, was elected president. I want to say a word for our coming

DASHES HERE AND THERE.

The W. C. T. U. of Lexington has had the rare good fortune of having John G. Woolley for the second time this year. The impression made at his first visit was deepened and strengthened by the meeting just closed. Commencing December 2, he gave six consecutive lectures. He spoke the first evening in the Presbyterian church, but that being too small to accommodate the numbers who wished to hear him, the meeting was adjourned to the Christian church. In his own inimitable way he pointed the sinful and erring soul to the Rock that is higher than all, and showed by the convincing power of logical reasoning the duty of Christian voters to remove temptation and make this world a safer place for tempted and tried humanity.

During Mr. Woolley's meeting the union had an addition of fourteen members and twelve honorary members. By invitation of the faculty, Mr. Woolley addressed the

A little entertainment was given not long since by the union at the railroad Y. M. C. The secretary of the railroad Y. M. C. A. holds meetings every Friday evening for railroad men and their families. He kindly offered the W. C. T. U. one of the meetings a quarter, which they gladly accepted.

The following item I am sure ought to encourage others: Through the influence of the Loyal Temperance Legion, one drinking man, whose children were members, signed the pledge last January, since which time, with God's help, he has not only kept his pledge, but has brought forty-three others to sign the pledge.

State Reporter, Lexington.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL

IN Erie county, N. Y., besides a colored union there are two Indian W. C. T. unions.

THE union at Pocatello, Idaho, has passed resolutions on the death of Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge.

MRS. LOUISE S. ROUNDS, president Illinois W. C. T. U., left last week for Clifton Springs, N. Y., where she will enjoy a well-earned rest of a couple of months.

THE New Jersey Y's hold their state conference at Camden, January 11 and 12. Mrs. Barnes and Miss Ensign will both be present and the Y's of neighboring states are cordially invited to attend.

THE Stockton, Cal., W. C. T. U. headquarters was the scene of a pleasant social occasion, December 11, when Mr. and Mrs. Arthur C. Knowles held a reception to celebrate their twenty-fifth wedding anniversary.

MISS ELLEN D. MORRIS writes that she secured a club of ten subscribers to The Woman's Signal at the Cleveland Convention. They will go to Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, Missouri, Ohio, Rhode Island, and District of Columbia.

A FRIEND to the good cause, Rev. Dr. Chas. E. Locke, of Portland, Ore., in a recent helpful lecture, entitled, "Give the Girls a Chance," advocated wider opportunities in citizenship, based among other substantial claims upon woman's power in reforms.

THE Sycamore, Ill., Y helped to make the hearts of many poor families very grateful by giving them Thanksgiving dinners. In response to a call for clothing for the poor about one hundred garments were donated, and the "Young Ladies' Guild" of Waterman Hall sent the Y's a check for ten dollars to aid their good work.

MRS. ESTHER T. HOUSH, the new corresponding secretary of Massachusetts has been made editor of the state paper, Our Message. This is one of the most sparkling state organs that comes to our table, and we congratulate Dr. Purington, the retiring editor, on having set so high a standard, and Mrs. Housh on the ability to maintain it. The feature of a letter from the president is one worthy of imitation by all our state papers.

MRS. EMMA M. BARRETT, evangelist, has just closed a very successful revival in the new and elegant Centenary Methodist Church of Portland, Ore., Dr. John N. Denison, pastor. Mrs. Barrett is a preacher of singular power, and is very successful in winning souls. She was formerly wholly devoted to W. C. T. U. work, but for many years has been giving her time to revival work. In this meeting sixty were converted and the church greatly quickened. Her home is Port Townsend, Wash.

"AMONG the resolutions of the National Convention I notice one to the effect that an invitation for a universal hour of noontide prayer be extended to all religious and philanthropic bodies. It may not be generally known, and may be of interest to many, that daily noontide prayer for the cause of missions has been held at the headquarters in New York city of the missionary society of the Protestant Episcopal church for the past twenty-five years." Thus writes the president of Sullivan county, N. Y., W. C. T. U., Mrs. Mary Morgan McKoon.

LADY HENRY SOMERSET and Miss Willard spoke on the twentieth anniversary of the Boston W. C. T. U., December 9th. Addresses were also made by Rev. Dr. and Mrs. A. J. Gordon, and our own Mrs. Alice J. Harris sang. Although the night was stormy ths beautiful great church was packed, pews and aisles being so crowded that an overflow meeting in the lecture room was addressed by the leading speakers. That woman of remarkable resource, Mrs. Dr. Gordon, has resigned the presidency of this model union, having so many other lines of work, and Mrs. Emily McLaughlin, one of the finest speakers that the white ribbon movement counts among its own, has been elected her successor.

RESCUE union has recently celebrated the formal opening of its new hall, 1456 Fulton street, Brooklyn. It was an occasion of great interest, as the hall is in a location abounding with liquor saloons, and its chief line of work will be that of rescuing those enslaved by drink. Mrs. E. Patterson, president of the union, presided. Addresses were made by several of our city pastors, also by Colonel Hadley, of New York. One of the noticeable features of the meeting was the formation of a Christian Men's Union as an auxiliary to the work of the W. C. T. U. Quite a number of men joined, and their plan of going out into the "highways and hedges," and bringing the weak and tempted to the bright, attractive hall where the sweet song and kind word greet them, promises to give to rescue work a wonderful impetus.

BELMOND, Ia., union with a membership of only seventeen and three honorary members is doing a work worthy of mention. They have bought a building of three rooms for headquarters; have started a woman's exchange, opened a reading room, responded to every call for money, according to their means, have sent a barrel of clothing and groceries valued at twenty-one dollars, to the Benedict Home at Decorah, and another filled with clothing and bedding to the children's aid association at Davenport, have distributed 37,735 pages of literature, some of which has been done up in packages, and placed in wagons along the streets, and have performed other good works too numerous to mention. As will be believed, there is no saloon in Belmond.

Cor. Secy's Notes.

So few of the state presidents were present during the last session of the Post-executive meeting that I wish to refer thus early in this column to the fact that it was decided to leave the appointment of delegates to the World's Convention to the executive committee of each state; these delegates to be appointed in the ratio of one for each one thousand of the paid membership in that state. This brings an additional incentive for speedy effort along the lines of securing new members, because our delegation may be largely increased in numbers if we but labor with sufficient zeal between now and next June. Already there are indications that the spirit of organization and increase is abroad in our ranks.

The following letter but just received has delighted my inmost heart:

DEMOREST, GA., Dec. 17, 1894.

DEAR MRS. STEVENSON:—The president of the Habersham county union in the ninth district of Georgia, sends you a pledge of loyalty in the work which has fallen upon you through the removal of our beloved Mary A. Woodbridge. I read with deep interest your message in Secretary's Notes in last week's UNION SIGNAL. All that you have asked we will most gladly try to do. Already a card has been sent our state president, pledging Habersham county's quota —forty—towards the five hundred new members asked of each state.

(Signed) H. E. SMITH.

Isn't that cause for rejoicing, and isn't it a glorious omen for our absolute oneness of heart and purpose that the very first pledge for the year comes from the sunny South-land?

Some of our dear sisters are very much troubled over a movement which seems to be making itself felt through print rather than in any more tangible manner. It is called the "Anti-W. C. T. U. movement," and its birthplace is said to be Chicago. The principal object of this somewhat unique organization seems to be to "offer something in place of the saloon," but just what that "something" will be, even its original promoters seem divided upon; one wing wishing to follow out Dr. Rainsford's idea of church-saloons, the other preferring that nothing stronger than coffee should be dispensed from its lunch-rooms. Its general declaration of principles embraces this sentence:

The organization is composed of people in Chicago and all over the country who feel that there is too much unreality about the work of the Christian Temperance Union. We are heartily disgusted with the management of the affairs. The movement has ceased to do practical good, and has degenerated into an office, salary-seeking, business concern.

Those who know the wealth (!) of our organization and the few salaries paid by it can well afford to smile at so glittering a generalization. There is no occasion for apprehension that this "anti" society will undo our work. Such efforts always react upon themselves.

The general officers of the National W. C. T. U., in a meeting held at the Temple, December 6, 1894, passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That we extend to Rev. J. W. Bashford, president of the Ohio Wesleyan University, our sincere thanks, not only for the forceful, brave, eloquent words uttered in our recent annual sermon, but for the fact that he generously gave his services, without expense, to the National treasury.

We wish, also, to express our appreciation of the public recognition his University has given to our President, Miss Willard, in bestowing upon her the title LL. D.

KATHARINE LENTE STEVENSON.

Treasurer's Corner.

Orders are coming in for Miss Willard's address, and the issue will soon be exhausted. It is gotten out in the W. T. P. A.'s best style, with illustrated cover, and would make a valuable present to an intelligent friend at such a small cost. The minutes are larger and more cumbersome, but in just as good style, and contain not only Miss Willard's address but reports and full minutes of Convention and much other matter. They are ready to send out and orders now in will be filled immediately.

Ohio, as usual, is on hand with monthly dues, the first received on the new year. I have asked the treasurer to give me in full Ohio's excellent and successful plan, and when received I shall copy and send to each state treasurer as suggestive of a better way.

Self-denial contributions have been received from Mrs. Downing, Tracy, Minn., $1.65; M. J. Dustin, Dayton, O., 25 cts.; Mrs. Lillian Chase, Factoryville, Pa., $1; Miss Bissell, Watawan, N. J., $1; Mrs. Vankirk, West Newton, Pa., 45 cts.; Miss Lashmutt, Buckeystown, Md., $3: Mrs. G. M. Roe, Chester, N. Y., $3; Mrs. Packard, Sturgis, Mich., 50 cts.; Lizzie Ferris, Archer, Neb., 15 cts.; M. V. Goodnow, Minnesota, $1; Ermina Thompson, Michigan, $2; Miss McMullen, Lake City, Ill., 50 cts.; C. L. Peek, Condersport, Pa., $1.73; Lillian M. Norton, Lynn, Mass., $4.10; Miss Barden, Rose Hill, Ia., 20 cts.; Mrs. Deming, Burke, N. Y., 10 cts.; Annie E. Foster, Ashland, Me., 40 cts.; Mrs. Parker, Oil City, Pa., $3.75; Mary Lou Putnam, Tullahoma, Tenn., $1.70; Mrs. Weeks, Mitchell, South Dakota, 30 cts.; Belle Reed, Vernon Center, Minn., 60 cts.; Lizzie K. Young, Ashland, Me., 20 cts.; Helen A. Nowland, Ashland, Me., 20 cts.; Mrs. Ellen Cottrill, St. George, Mo., $2.96; Mrs. Rich, Bozeman, Mont., $3.30; Mrs. McAllister, Crested Butte, Colo., $3.50; Friend of the W. C. T. U., Millersburg, Ky., $1; Minnie Olin, Troy, O., $2.49; Miss Scarborough, Payson, Ill., $1.50; Mrs. Hunt, South Sudbury, Mass., $4; Adeline Brinkerhoff, Dutchess Junction, N. Y., $1.50. Many contributions received during November on account of Convention matter have not been noticed in the Corner, but have all been receipted.

I am very glad to record that two of our superintendents, Mrs. Grubb and Mrs. Leiter, have sent in birthday gifts, but I dare not tell how much. Some young friend sent twelve cents as birthday gift, and I was sorry no name accompanied it.

Mrs. S. H. Manning, of Georgia, writes: "As I read your Corner yesterday I said: 'I, too, will give my penny a year, and a few to carry, so enclosed please find $1. I feel the more called upon to do this as a thankoffering as well, for our safety during the cyclone which passed so near us, without harm to us." May others follow.

I trust after Christmas is over that our hearts will all be so full of joy and gratitude to the Giver of all our blessings that it will lead us to a deeper consecration, and hence to deeper interest in our blessed work. With best wishes for a happy Christmas to all readers of the Corner, I am,

With love and hope, yours for work,
HELEN M. BARKER.

MONTHLY READINGS.

No live, up-to-date local union can afford to do without our monthly Bible and Responsive Readings. The by our National evangelists are spiritually strengthening and uplifting, and this means, as white-ribboners well know, added momentum to the work in whatever direction effort is put forth.

Bible Readings

The

The Bible Reading for January is prepared by Miss Anna Downey, and the topic is "PENTECOSTAL PREPARATION." Just what we need to equip us for the work of the New Year.

In the Responsive Reading, under the title, "PROHIBITION CROSS FIRE," D. D. Tower furnishes a valuable exercise, with a view to "ascertaining our position on the troubled waters of the present political sea."

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—We thank you for giving this snug corner to the Organizers. We are now under marching orders, and I trust are ready to obey when called upon to report.

The day after our Cleveland Convention closed it was my privilege to meet with the Wade Park union of that city and hold a mothers' meeting. Most of the new members secured the Sunday previous were present, including some of the honoraries. The mothers were quite astonished to see the chocolate drops filled with brandy, which I had bought in their city at the confectioner's, and I think the knowledge of this, with other snares set for their boys, inspired them with new zeal.

Thanksgiving found me all day on the train en route for Staten Island, and the next ten days were spent in the work there and in Brooklyn, N. Y. Our faithful women there are neither discouraged nor idle.

One of them recently had the courage to enter the side door of a saloon at two o'clock on Sunday morning, and there found a large number of boys from twelve to twenty years of age. One of these was librarian in the Sunday-school, and his mother the same day refused to join our organization, no doubt thinking, like many others, that her boy was safe. These boys were playing pool and drinking beer, and it is probable their parents supposed they were in their rooms asleep. This is the way our license laws are enforced in our grand Empire state, where it was decided a few months since by our constitutional convention that woman's ballot was not needed. December 10 we held a meeting in the interest of rescue work in Spring Valley, N. Y., and a liberal collection was sent to our rescue home in Elmira.

January 24, 1895, I expect to begin work in Clinton Co., N. Y., where I shall remain until February 20. About the middle of May I commence a series of engagements in Maine, but from January 10 to 21 I could accept a few calls from Pennsylvania, New York or New Jersey, and between March 5 and April 20 from any point east of the Mississippi river.

HELEN L. BULLOCK.

Our Library Table.

DEW DROPS. A collection of verse, by D. S. Pennell. A companion volume by the same author is entitled WAVELETS.
Wm. H. Pile's Sons, Philadelphia, Pa.

SARAH DAKOTA. By Mary E. Q. Brush. A lively, spicy story for young people, strong in moral principle and happily tinged with romance. Sarah Dakota is a bright girl of the prairies whose first sorrow is the advent of a step-mother, but she discovers after a variety of mishaps and storms that step-mothers are not the worst kind of people in the world.
Hunt & Eaton, New York; Cranston & Curts, Cincinnati. Price $1.

MARTHA'S MISTAKES. By Mrs. M. E. Bradley. A story for girls. Martha is a very natural, very sensible, sometimes very sinning daughter, and girl readers will take comfort in her successes and failures. Mrs. Bradley's pen is skillful and judicious as well as bright, and her characters live and move in such life-like ways one forgets they are only book people.
Cranston & Curts, Cincinnati; Hunt & Eaton, New York. Price $1.25.

An odd little book bearing upon its cover the figures of a sphinx and an owl facing each other, is entitled A CENTURY OF CHARADES. The author is William Bellamy. Each page of the book contains one charade and there are one hundred in all. The quaint volume will be of no use to a lazy person, for no answers are given, there being instead an ingenious "key" by which, after an answer is obtained, it can be verified.
Houghton, Mifflin & Company, Boston and New York. Price $1..

Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin & Co. are the publishers of the invaluable series of books known as "American Men of Letters." These are edited by Charles Dudley Warner. The latest number of this group is GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS, by Edward Cary. The author has paid mete tribute to his subject and one closes the volume with a feeling that the foundations of Americanism can never be utterly shaken because such men as Irving, Webster, Thoreau, Bryant, Emerson and Poe have formed an integral part of the mighty structure.
Houghton, Mifflin & Company, Boston and New York. Price, $1.25.

ANIMALS' RIGHTS. By H. S. Salt. Mr. Salt call his book an essay. It is rather a series of short, but exhaustive essays on this much discussed subject. The author advances bold theories, for which he will without doubt be held in derision, if not in scorn. One thing, however, is certain, the human race is rarely over-kind to its dumb companions on the earth and they need just such uncompromising words said on their behalf. In the same volume, Dr. Albert Leffingwell presents an essay on "Vivisection in America," vivisection in medical schools and in American colleges being the main features under consideration.
MacMillan & Co., publishers, 66 Fifth avenue, New York. Price 75 cents.

DAILY MESSAGES FROM THE KING BY HIS MESSENGERS. Selected and arranged by S. R. Z. Preface by Mrs. Margaret E. Sangster.
It is a Daughter of the King, for whom the non-committing initials stand, we are told by Mrs. Sangster. The book is arranged as many similar ones are, a page for each day in the year, a text of Scripture followed by appropriate selections in prose or verse on each page. The young author has made sweet and thoughtful choice, and her DAILY MESSAGES will carry sunshine to many hearts.
Marcus Ward & Co., Limited, 310 to 318 Sixth avenue, New York. Price $1.

THE CHILD AMY. By Julia Magruder. An interesting story couched in beautiful terms. The character of the little heroine is strangely beyond her years, since at six she acts and speaks in more womanly fashion than many children at twelve. The little one was picked up at sea, finds entrance into a stern and divided house. The story preaches so sweet a sermon on love that no child but will be better for reading it, and to many an older eye will come the moisture of sympathy and tenderness which is the spontaneous tribute to the beautiful child-love that refines and brightens, and is so often the salvation of the world. The book is beautifully printed and bound, and the excellent illustrations and dainty title-page are from drawings by Helen Maitland Armstrong.
Lothrop Publishing Co., Boston. Price $1.50.

SONGS FOR THE SHUT-IN. Compiled by Mary Craig Yarrow.
The "Shut-in Society" was organized a few years ago and now numbers over a thousand members. "To be a sufferer, shut in from the outside world, constitutes one a proper candidate for membership." Associate members are persons who, by writing letters, sending papers and books, and little presents, cause some brightness to shine into the hard, dull lives of those who on account of sickness spend their days indoors, often in one room. This collection of songs dedicated to this society, has been selected with much care from a variety of sources and from the best authors, with special reference to the severe trials of these our suffering brethren.
Thomas Whittaker, publisher, 2 and 3 Bible House, New York. Price 75 cents.

A book that will soon create a wide demand for itself is FAGOTS FOR THE FIRESIDE, by Lucretia P. Hale. To best give the gist of the book the following may be quoted from the preface: "The Fagot Party is the name given to an entertainment, to which each member of the company invited must come prepared with some game, story, riddle, or song for the amusement of the rest. Such a series of entertainments was carried on by a company of friends who had long been in the habit of meeting often. The Fagot parties introduced by this collection of friends brought out a variety of games and amusements, new and old, which are given here with suggestions and additions of the merry party as they gave them a trial." The plan of the book and its contents are a success in every way, its over three hundred pages being aglow with innocent methods of having a "good time."
Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston and New York. Price, $1.25.

LIFE'S EVERYDAYNESS.

By Rose Porter.

This beautiful little volume is a gem. It is composed of sprightly, short essays on Christian and home themes, which are both instructive and soul-refreshing. It is just such a book as should be in the hands of every young wife. It will help them to be cheerful, hopeful, God-confiding, Christ-loving, and to make home pleasant and happy. It is also eminently practical.

Joseph Cook will be editor-in-chief, and Hazlitt Alva Cuppy, associate editor and business manager. Mr. Cuppy is a graduate of Heidelberg University, and has traveled extensively and formed important acquaintances with distinguished men abroad. He is devoted to the reforms which his Review, as well as Our Day, has heretofore advocated, and has proved his sincerity by many self-sacrifices. He was born in Indiana in 1863, and is giving the bright ardor of his early manhood to reformed journalism. The title of the combination will be Our Day: The Altruistic Review, an Illustrated Monthly Record of Reform. All the leading purposes of the magazine as hitherto conducted will remain unchanged. It is expected that the distinguished group of hard-working practical reformers, which Our Day has had as associate editors, will be retained on its staff.

There's no Danger to be feared, even if you do use too much Pearline in the washing. If there's any danger of damage at all, it's when you use too little. In that case, you'll have to begin that dreadful rubbing—and carloads of Pearline couldn't do as much damage to your clothes as that will.

Follow the directions on the package—that's the best way of all. But remember, too much won't hurt anything. It's only a waste of good Pearline.

Send it Back. Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearline, be honest—send it back. 439 JAMES PYLE, New York.

Books for Mothers and Daughters.

Confidential Talks with Young Women. By LYMAN B. SPERRY, M. D., Lecturer on Sanitary Science, Carleton College, Minn Author of "Concerning Narcotics," "Confidential Talks with Young Men," etc. With introduction by Frances E. Willard and Mary Wood Allen. 16mo, cloth, 75c.

This helpful volume, treating an important subject from a Christian, medical point of view, should be carefully read, and its contents imparted to the daughters of to-day.

In all the long catalogue of useful books published by Revell, I know of none more likely to do noble service than Dr. Sperry's two series of "Confidential Talks with Young Men and Young Women." These books treat of subjects the most delicate in an absolutely plain and fearless way without that mischievous vagueness so often assumed by writers of such books—a prudery that aggravates by its half-suggestions whatever pruriency may be lurking in the mind of the reader.—Golden Rule.

The Science of Motherhood. BY HANNAH WHITALL SMITH, author of "The Christian's Secret of a Happy Life." Paper, board and illuminated cover. 12mo, 35c.

"To be a mother is the grandest vocation in the world. No other human being has a position of such power and influence. She holds in her hands the destiny of nations, for to her is necessarily committed the making of the nation's citizens." This extract from the author's prefatory chapter but enunciates the principle of the little volume, and our readers are sufficiently familiar with the gifted author's former volumes to realize that in this new line of thought they will have a helpful treatise.

Signal Notes.

RAMABAI'S school at Poonah now enrolls fifty pupils.

PROFESSOR GEFFCHEN in The Nineteenth Century estimates the war reserve of Germany at six million pounds in coined gold locked up in the Julius Tower of Spandau.

ONE of the most eminent of Scottish Americans was Dr. James McCosh, ex-president of Princeton, who recently died at the ripe age of eighty-three. Three million dollars have been contributed through his efforts, to educational and religious enterprises.

THERE are seventy Congregational churches with twelve thousand members, and eighty-two Sunday-schools with twenty-two thousand children in Chicago. More than half of these have been planted and nurtured by the City Missionary Society which held its twelfth anniversary recently.

THE government of Canada has prohibited the sale of intoxicants among the Indians of Hudson Bay territory, and punishes severely any violation of this law. For instance, one vender had his illicit goods confiscated and was jailed for three years. The government is determined to prevent the debasement of the Indians in its care..

A WRITER in the League Journal strongly urges the observance of a Burns Temperance anniversary, January 24, consistently claiming that the study of the marred life of the great bard would be a most telling and fitting object lesson. This sort of celebration would far better succeed those which end in disaster for many young men (and young women too) who learn first to drink at a Burns birthday fete.

GENERAL BOOTH in a recent address said: "Out of every one hundred girls that we have taken from the streets, eighty per cent after three years' trial, are found to be walking in the paths of virtue, and we save these girls at a cost of no more than sixteen dollars. Sixteen dollars is not a great cost at which to save a girl from off the streets. It is not more than many a lady spends for a dress, or even for a new bonnet."

OF the $3,758,905 paid for the teachers' salaries in Michigan last year, $2,800,243 was paid to women teachers, whose average wages was $34.36 per month, against an average of $48.89 paid to male teachers. There were 16,335 teachers employed, of whom 13,005 were women. The value of school property is $15,757,921. Free text books were furnished in 764 districts, These facts are gleaned from the report of the state superintendent of public instruction.

ACCORDING to Rev. C. S. Adama von Scheltema, of Arnheim, Holland, the novitii of the universities in that country for the first two months have much to suffer from the older students among whom very few are total abstainers. In Ubrecht there are only eight, yet his son and his best friend have the courage to be novitii as acknowledged teetotalers. On a certain day the novitii were ordered to have a race on the river; the whole number to row against one another in common boats, but the two young teetotalers were ordered to row against the two best rowers of the university. It was expected that the champions would easily make fools of the two young presumptuous chickens, but the teetotalers had a splendid victory which was loyally received and acknowledged. It was a splendid triumph for our principle.

THE American Sabbath Union, of which Rev. G. S. Mott, D. D., of New York, is president, observed its sixth anniversary in New York city, December 9 and 10. Rev. Bishop E. G. Andrews delivered the anniversary sermon on this unusually interesting occasion, and all the addresses and papers were of exceptional power. The gathering—at the special invitation of the union—of over one hundred ladies of New York city, well known in philanthropic and religious circles, to consider the many aspects of the Sabbath question, was a new departure, which, it is believed, will result in practical methods to advance the work of the union. The Sabbath observance mass-meeting, in which the various young people's organizations of New York city participated, was an enthusiastic gathering. The topic discussed was "The Relation of the American Sabbath to Good Citizenship and Christian Progress in the Nation and the Duty of Young People to Assist in Maintaining the Sacred Day." The union will take up its important national work for 1895 with an inspiration not hitherto known.

PRIZE WALL PAPER DESIGNS.

Alfred Peats, the Well Known Wall Paper Merchant of New York and Chicago, Awards $1,000 in Cash Prizes—Names of the Successful Artists.

No doubt our readers remember the offer recently made and widely published by Mr. Alfred Peats, the famous wall paper merchant, of $1,000 in cash to the artists producing the best designs for wall paper effect.

The awarding of the prizes in this contest has just been completed. The judges were among the foremost representatives of art in this country, being Miss Elizabeth A. Talbot, teacher of the Class of Design in Cooper Union, N. Y.; Mr. Louis J. Millet, of Healy & Millet, teacher in the Art Institute, Chicago; Mr. Wm. Campbell, of New York; Mr. John McCoy, color artist of the New York Card and Paper Co., and Mr. Alfred Peats.

The prizes were awarded to the following contestants:

Parlor Paper with an 18 inch border and ceiling to match — Entry No. 299—First Prize, Miss F. D. Willets, 2804 Indiana Ave., Chicago, Ill. Entry No. 828—Second Prize, Scipion Poujol, 1 and 3 Union Square, N. Y.

Parlor Paper with a 9 inch border and ceiling to match — Entry No. 849 — First Prize, A. M. Rose & Co., Designers, Union Square, N. Y. Entry No. 479 — Second Prize, Miss Ina Jeannette Bullis, 117 E. 59th St., N. Y.

Hall Paper with a 9 inch border and ceiling to match—Entry No. 354—First Prize, Julius Hamann, Mamaroneck, N. Y. Entry No. 503 — Second Prize, Juliet B. Seaman, Richmond, S. I., N. Y.

While there were thousands of designs from amateurs that displayed artistic originality and talent, the majority of the prizes were won by professional designers of large experience.

The prize winning designs will be reproduced upon wall paper, in time to decorate the homes of many people in the United States, whose tastes are artistic, but who cannot afford to pay exorbitant prices for elaborate patterns. It is intended to put the prices of these prize designs so low that they will be within the reach of everyone, and samples will be sent to any address in the United States upon receipt of 10c. to pay postage.

Address Alfred Peats, Dept. 23, 30-32 West 13th St., New York, or 136-138 West Madison St., Chicago.
